To try and prevent this scenario using peaceful methods, he said, Israel has embraced the new "engagement" approach put forth by U.S. President Barack Obama, calling for "regional reconciliation in the Middle East, something our government has adopted fully."

Beyond this, Miller asked western nations to understand that while Israel might be the Iran's "first target," its ballistic missile program has progressed to the point where it can also reach into western Europe, Russia and China, among others.

He warned that the international community must start cracking down now on Iranian proxy companies and organizations that funnel money back to the Islamic Republic, circumventing existing international sanctions.

"Dealing with Iran should be the top issue in the world," Miller said. "If Iran goes nuclear, the non-proliferation treaty would collapse."

Miller also praised Canada's efforts on Iran and terrorism in general, saying Israel "highly appreciates" Ottawa's stance on the Middle East, and hopes that it would use its influence in the upcoming G8 July summit in L'Aquila, Italy, to convince other states of the necessity to band together on Iran.

"Canada can make sure that the Iranian issue is given prominence."

He said the world will need to make a "serious assessment" on Iran by the time of this year's UN General Assembly meeting in New York in late September.

Israel's message to the world is that it needs to "wake up" to the Iranian threat, Miller said, and that it must accept there will be a short-term economic price to pay – likely in the price of oil – to isolate Iran politically and economically, and tamp down its belligerence.

"Iran does not want to be a pariah state. For its ideology to succeed, it needs to be a part of the international community," Miller said, suggesting that measures such as bans on travel for its diplomats and professionals, as well as oil embargoes, among other non-military tactics, can "drive the message home to Iran."

"The price [the international community] will pay today, will be much less than it will need to pay in the future when dealing with a nuclear Iran."

Israeli real estate marketed in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The investment potential of Israeli companies, particularly those of the cutting-edge high-tech variety, is not exactly a closely-guarded secret anymore.

But it turns out there's another kind of Israeli investment that has done quite well in recent months, holding its value as stock markets around the world tumbled.

Israeli real estate has done better than most other ventures, and it turns out people from around the world see it as a legitimate asset to add to their portfolio. Last weekend, potential investors in Toronto got to view what their counterparts in London, Milan, New York, Johannesburg and Los Angeles have already seen – a spiel by a number of Israeli developers and law firms extolling the virtues of Israeli residential properties.

The event marked the first time Israeli developers offered their product directly to Toronto investors, said Ainnat Lifshitz, director of marketing and sales of Bayit4U, coordinator of the event. Organized in conjunction with Bayit BeIsrael, an Israeli real estate consulting company, the event "brings companies to Canada, including bank representatives and lawyers, who give a panoramic view of Israel and cover all aspects of real estate, including legal, financial and availability issues," she said.

The focus of the exhibitors was on residential properties, which have been good performers as of late. In the last quarter in Israel, housing prices rose five per cent. Demand for homes was up 14.6 per cent in April 2009 over the same period in 2008, Lifshitz said.

"People realize that Israeli real estate [values] stood still during this economic crisis," she stated. "That's because of Israeli consumer behaviour and because Israel is small and there are not enough projects for the country."

For people in the Diaspora, purchasing a second home in Israel fulfills a dream of residing in the Holy Land while others see it in financial terms. Still other investors see it as a hedge against local anti-Semitism. Bayit BeIsrael has been quite successful in marketing Israeli product, with the exhibition in London generating interest that eventually led to 100 purchases, she said.

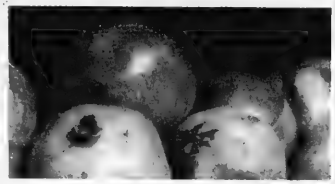
Stir Crazy



'Indian food – no longer alien'

By DOROTHY LIPOVENKO
Special to The CJN

When she first saw her mother-in-law's Shabbat table with the gefilte fish and then boiled chicken, Sarah Remer was slightly unnerved. The fare was as alien to her as the samosas and bhajis of her native Calcutta were to her husband's family.

Recalling that long-ago time, Remer chuckles, not just at the memory, but because her Jewish-Indian cooking eventually won new fans from unexpected quarters. "My mother-in-law took my recipes," she says.

Little wonder. Those recipes, fragrant with cardamom, cumin and cinnamon, bright with turmeric and sizzling with mustard seeds and shards of fresh ginger, are delicious without intimidating tamer palates. Indeed, a heaping platter of crispy samosas that she made recently for her granddaughter's Jewish school classmates was "demolished."

Since arriving in Montreal as a young woman with her family in 1961, Remer has kept to the style of cooking that has nourished centuries of her ancestors in India (on her father's side) dating back to around the time of the First Temple. When she married, she continued to cook the way her mother did: pilafs of rice and lentils, vegetable dishes known as bahjis and the one-pot triad of rice and vegetables with fish or chicken called baltis.

Exotic is in – even in kosher cooking – but 40 years ago, the spices and condiments integral to Indian recipes were not readily available here. How were authentic dishes replicated? Remer recalls that her mother would receive packets of spices from aunts in England or family still in India.

But the spice cupboard in Remer's airy kitchen reveals a diverse group of seasonings that have long since joined "mainstream" spice racks in supermarkets: garam masala, cinnamon sticks, whole cumin (destined for a coffee grinder), chili powder, ground coriander, turmeric, cardamom pods, anise, mustard seeds. In addition to "dry" seasonings Remer also makes liberal use of fresh leaves of coriander and mint, knobs of ginger and pudgy cloves of garlic. Even kosher coconut milk is no longer a stretch.

Much of what she cooks is pareve, marrying well with meat or chicken. For Shabbat lunch, the Remer household might enjoy turmeric-rubbed chicken scented with cloves, cinnamon and cardamom, cooked on a bed of basmati rice crisp with onions. It's a chamim dish (a slow-cooked Shabbat stew) prepared in a most unusual but stunning beaten-aluminum pot from India once used in the clay oven of the Calcutta home of her youth.

On a recent spring afternoon, Remer, who likes to keep it simple, gives this visitor a cooking demonstration, and from the taste, it's easy to see why Indian cuisine has such star power in vegetarian kitchens. (For those who want to get started, Martha Rose Shulman's Spicy Vegetarian Feasts has several excellent recipes that tilt to the Indian table. There is also Mavis Hyman's Indian-Jewish Cooking, published in England).

• • •

For red lentils and basmati rice: toast one teaspoon of cumin seed in a little oil, add a sliced onion and saute until golden. Add four whole cloves, one two-inch stick of cinnamon, three minced cloves of garlic, half a teaspoon of turmeric and a little salt. Mix well and heat gently for a minute or two to release their flavours. Stir in 1 cup basmati rice, half a cup of red lentils and three cups of water. Bring to a boil, turn down heat and simmer, covered, for about 45 minutes. Remove cinnamon stick before serving.

For the vegetable: To a little oil heated in a deep skillet, add one teaspoon of mustard seeds and cover pan till they pop. (Keep the heat low to avoid burning.) When seeds are done, add a medium diced onion and three small potatoes cubed. Stir fry for 5-10 minutes, adding a little water if the mixture gets dry.

Now add half a teaspoon of turmeric, a diced large tomato, a small head of cut-up cauliflower, one teaspoon of cumin powder, one half to one teaspoon of freshly grated ginger and a little salt. Mix well, cover and simmer 15 minutes, adding water if necessary.

Serve this and the rice/lentils with fish.

'Genetic modified food safe – so far,' Israeli scientist says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

An Israeli scientist defended the genetic engineering of food for human consumption as a means of improving the production and nutrition of plants, as well as reducing the need for pesticides.

Gad Galili, head of the Mel Dobrin Centre for Nutrition at the Weizmann Institute of Science, said no health risks have been associated with genetically modified (GM) crops after more than 10 years of commercial production on some 120 million hectares of land.

He was a guest speaker in Montreal at a panel discussion on nutrition and health, sponsored by Weizmann Science Canada and designed for women.

Galili was less definite in taking a position on whether GM foods will prove to be safe over the longer term.

"There is not a simple answer. Who can predict? We don't know the long-term effects," he acknowledged.

Despite his defence, Galili counselled the public to raise its concerns about GM foods, not to stop them, but to ensure that they are developed in a way that means the benefits outweigh any hazards.

Galili, chair of the department of plant science, urged that the controversial issue of GM foods be put into perspective. The development of these engineered crops can alleviate world hunger and malnutrition, he maintained.

Fruits, veggies promote health

Breeding is not the solution because natural genes cannot be transferred between different plant species, he said. Usually, only one or two genes are added to a plant in any scientific intervention.

He also noted that fruits and vegetables marketed as organic are not necessarily any safer than regular produce, because they can harbour bacteria like salmonella if they are fertilized with manure.

The program's moderator, chemist Joe Schwarcz, director of McGill University's Office for Science and Society, noted that "unfortunately," the only GM foods in Canada are soy, corn and canola.

Generally, Galili encouraged the consumption of more and a greater variety of plant-based foods for the many different antioxidants they contain. Plants produce these compounds to protect themselves from threats coming from their environment. In humans, antioxidants counter the damaging free radicals produced in the body by oxygen, and they help to counter illness and aging, he said.

Humans have about 800 compounds per cell, while plants typically have 20,000 compounds per cell, and only a fraction of them are fully understood. "And there are probably many thousand more that we do not know about," he said.

Much more research is needed to also understand the metabolism that produces these compounds and the genes that regulate their production, he said.

Galili was joined by Dr. Richard Béliveau, author of the bestselling book Foods That Fight Cancer, who holds the chair in cancer prevention and treatment at the Université du Québec à Montréal, and chef and cooking instructor Shawna Goodman-Sone.

Béliveau said almost everyone over age 40 has microscopic tumours in their body, and diet is a major factor in whether they become "clinically relevant." Heredity is much less significant in getting cancer than is commonly thought, he said, and is a factor in less than 15 per cent of cases.

Maintaining a healthy body weight is also key in cancer prevention, he said.

He strongly urges the consumption of a variety of vegetables and fruits, at least five servings a day, and seven for those over 50, as well as other plant foods like green tea, ginger and spices. Of course, one must also avoid or cut back on foods that can contribute to the development of cancer. Among these, he includes red meat. No more than a pound a week should be eaten, he said.

She helped design the luncheon menu, which included chickpea hummus, a red cabbage and grapefruit slaw, edamame (fresh soybeans), and a barley and lentil pilaf. There were also plenty of vegetables, and the animal protein –chicken – served more as a condiment than as the main feature of the plate.

Dessert was also healthy, consisting of a bittersweet chocolate shell filled with berries. The beverage during the meal was pomegranate juice, and green tea or coffee were served afterward.

Culinary artist teaches kids to cook

Ever since Giddens was a little girl, she found joy and comfort in the kitchen. Her earliest baking memory dates back to childhood – she was caught sitting on the counter covered in a mixture of flour and water that her brother had helped her prepare. The episode was documented on video, and to this day represents the 25-year-old's greatest passion.

It's fitting that Giddens' business is called Batterfingers (416-569-9337). From a hobby to a successful venture, her baking is becoming her career.

While she originally studied to be a teacher, Giddens has chosen a path less travelled. She's combined her skills with her love of children and created the perfect recipe – a lunch-time cooking class for elementary students. Run in schools across Toronto, the program allows kids to bake in a safe and sanitary manner, rewarding them with their goodies at the end of the hour.

Giddens supplies the ingredients and the utensils, and guides the group with step-by-step instructions. In addition to making delectable desserts, she also prepares appetizers and main courses with the children, including personal pizzas, stir fry and lasagna.

She has recently expanded her cooking lessons to include birthday parties, adding an option of arts and crafts. Parents can choose which activities and foods they prefer – constructing tissue paper flower pots, decorating cupcakes or making salt sundaes are just a few possibilities. Giddens says her ultimate goal is to open her own studio, where those who are hungry to learn the art of baking can all come together.

Until then, Giddens will continue to whip up her treats in the home where her talent was born. She's declared the basement oven her own property, beause she's able to focus and avoid distraction there. Giddens ensures her workspace is kosher and that her goods are free of nuts (her candied almonds, however, are an exception). Since many children have food allergies, she's sensitive to their restrictions.

While the positive feedback keeps Giddens going, it's the artist in her that wants to keep flourishing. She looks forward to celebrating milestones and simchahs, as they give her an excuse to jazz up her baking. One impressive creation was a four-tier wedding cake she made for her cousin – not to mention the giant engagement ring cake she made for her brother.

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Among the many victims of the economic crisis, charitable organizations have been particularly hard hit. But one innovative Toronto entrepreneur is stepping in to help fill the gap.

David Katz, a former communications and marketing consultant, launched Jackthedonkey.com in March as an online social networking site. Unlike most ventures of its kind, however, Katz's site donates more than half of its advertising revenue to non-profit organizations such as Habitat for Humanity, Ronald McDonald House and the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Canada.

"Even the charities that people might think are established, they're really struggling right now. These are the ones who are trying to make a better world for all of us, and I would hate to see them lose the momentum they've been creating," Katz said.

A graduate of the Schulich School of Business at York University, Katz spent 10 years working as a consultant while volunteering for organizations such as the Special Olympics. After a while, however, he found himself looking for a more meaningful full-time career.

"I was leading a fairly conservative life, you go to work, you go home, and I realized there wasn't a lot of value in what I was doing in the corporate world," he said.

David Katz

Inspired by his involvement with non-profit organizations, he hatched the idea for Jack the Donkey in September 2008, and decided to make it his main occupation.

"I see so many people spending so many hours a day on social networking sites, and it's such a good opportunity to make some money for charities," he explained.

Jack the Donkey started as a simple picture-sharing site, but based on the encouragement of its initial users, Katz decided to turn it into a full-fledged social networking venue. Now, in addition to sharing photos, users can meet and interact with others on the site, both those they know offline as well as those they don't.

"The whole idea was to create a social network where you just so happen to be making money for the charity of your choice," Katz said.

When users register, they are able to choose from a list of charities to benefit from their time online. Each page view generates two cents, Katz said, with 55 per cent of that going directly to charity. So far, 15 non-profit organizations and about 500 users have signed up.

In addition to reaching out to non-profit organizations, Katz also recruits advertisers himself, rather than relying on third-party agencies. So far he has drawn most of his support from local Toronto businesses, but he believes that as the site grows it will provide a unique advertising venue.

"The whole theory behind Jack the Donkey is that there are a lot of really rich corporations that sponsor golf tournaments or stadiums and so on. Here companies can sponsor on a smaller scale and have a big impact in terms of good will," he said.

Online social networking sites are a hot-ticket item at the moment, but starting up a new one is not so simple. While Facebook and Twitter have become Internet juggernauts, the once-mighty MySpace has been losing ground and others, such as Friendster or Orkut, are barely even on the radar any longer.

Katz, however, believes that Jack the Donkey has an approach that distinguishes it from its more entrenched competitors, aside from the obvious draw of supporting worthwhile causes.

While Facebook has been the most successful social networking site to date, it doesn't provide users with enough of an opportunity to interact with those outside of their own social bubble, Katz said. Jack the Donkey, he believes, takes an approach that is more in tune with the frontier mentality of the Internet, where the possibilities of interaction are more open.

"My whole issue with Facebook is that I got bored with the same people seeing the same status updates. We're trying to push people towards meeting other people on the site," Katz said.

"We've created a website that provides you with a lot of the functionality of Facebook, but you're not going to be limited to your clique. There's an element of randomness, kind of a choose your own adventure, where once you click on one profile you are exposed to a new group you wouldn't have found as easily in some other communities," he added.

In this respect, Katz is inspired by Twitter, the micro-blogging platform that allows users to post updates of 140 characters or less.

"Facebook is where you go to meet people you know, whereas Twitter is where you go to meet people you want to know," he said.

With Twitter, however, Katz found it difficult to keep up with the high volume of updates, and he believes that Jack the Donkey can provide a more manageable middle ground.

"It provides you with that shotgun approach of Twitter, a much stronger opportunity to actually network and meet people. But on Jack the Donkey, it's not quite that hyper energy," he said.

Besides being useful and enjoyable for users and raising money for charities, Jack the Donkey also has a broader mission of getting people interested in worthwhile causes, as well as helping non-profit organizations reach out to a larger public.

"We want to use the whole soft-sell approach to get people involved in fundraising, activism, volunteerism," Katz said.

"There's so many different causes out there that are important. I think it's an opportunity for all of these different charities and causes to work together and create something special."

Panel addresses anti-Israel 'crisis' on campus

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

A wave of misinformation is being used by the media and academics to attack Israel, according to a panel that spoke at York University recently.

Crisis on Canadian Campuses, a June 11 panel discussion organized by Hillel at York and hosted by Chabad Lubavitch, was held in advance of a two-day conference called Israel Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace.

The panellists expressed concern about what they said was the June 22-24 conference's agenda to push for a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, which many fear would put an end to the Jewish state. They also discussed the hostile climate on campus between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students.

Held in advance of York conference

Compared with the anti-Israel activities of the early 1980s, "the situation has [worsened] dramatically," said panel moderator Guidy Mamann, an immigration law specialist and a York graduate. "Today, when I spoke to some of the young students who were going [to York], they described incalculable fear on campus, and that is because things almost seem to be out of control."

University of Toronto associate professor of molecular genetics Sean Egan noted that many academic institutions have a long history of anti-western, pro-totalitarian ideologies, and he criticized what he said are the lack of legitimate credentials that are needed to be published on issues of foreign policy and race relations in academic journals.

"It's no coincidence that many of the most influential academics have achieved high stature through ideology rather than scholarship. We can call to mind famous academics trained in linguistics or English literature who have established fame and fortune by attacking Israel," said Egan, who was one of the signatories of an ad opposing Israeli Apartheid Week at U of T signed by 125 faculty members this spring and published in the National Post.

He suggested several steps that should be implemented in order to make not just campuses, but all public institutions and communities safer for everyone.

The first step, Egan said, is sensitivity training that would educate future generations about the positive contributions of Jews to world culture. He also believes it is necessary for Jewish and Christian organizations to unite in order to combat hostility toward Judeo-Christian values.

In addition, Egan suggested that free speech conferences on campuses that promote anti-western ideologies should be filmed as evidence of what actually transpires during these meetings.

"We need to get the university administrations to agree to film these events as the least they can do to provide a campus free of threat and intimidation," he said.

Eldad Zacksenhaus of the University Health Network cancer research institute said that the far left's agenda on university campuses is part of "a long campaign to delegitimize, dehumanize and eventually destroy Israel and its Jewish populace."

Zacksenhaus, who was also one of the signatories of the ad opposing Israeli Apartheid Week, said anti-Zionist hate speech is able to flourish on campuses because it is being "camouflaged" as free speech, mostly by Arabs and their left-wing supporters.

But despite the propaganda disseminated by the Muslim world, Zacksenhaus believes that anti-Israel Jews may be a worse threat.

"It is most frustrating to watch Israeli Jews bash Israel and call for the destruction of the State of Israel... We must stop acting as apologists to those who wish to destroy us," he said.

Ron Banerjee, director of the Hindu Conference of Canada, spoke about the unwavering support of the Hindu community for Israel and the Jewish community, as both nations can empathize with the struggles of the other.

"It is not enough just to say that India is a good friend of Israel. It is more accurate to say that the Hindu majority of India is a friend of the Jewish people," he said.

Banerjee compared the plight of the Hindu nationalist party to that of Jewish Zionists, and he assured the audience that organizations such as the Vishva Hindu Parishad, the Bharatiya Janata Party and the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, which together encompass tens of millions of Hindu nationalists, stand behind Israel's fight for justice.

"It is really the largest consolidated block of pro-Israel, pro-Zionist support anywhere on the planet," he said of the Hindu groups.

The fourth panellist was Meir Weinstein, national director of the Jewish Defence League of Canada.

An open, non-judgmental environment that embraces all affiliations is what Rabbi Tina Grimberg believes our community should be striving for. Rabbi Grimberg likens the attitude that the Jewish community should have toward LGBT (Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Trans-gendered) individuals to the biblical story of how Abraham treated the three visitors to his tent, following his conversion.

You were pulled away on a current of tears 2 years ago at the tender age of eight. It's so hard to believe that 2 years have passed since we saw your sweet face and held your hand. Your tireless days were spent chasing after every chance to generate laughter. And though now we can never see you play in the park, you'll still play on forever in the park of our hearts. Your joy will always light our eyes. Life is measured by impact, not span. We'll laugh, sing and dance all the time thanks to the impact of one little man. This is his gift. Sadly missed and forever in our hearts!

U.S. intelligence opposed to Pollard parole

By AMIR OREN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The U.S. government's intelligence establishment comprises 16 agencies, but despite intra-agency rivalry, the heads of all of them agree on opposing early parole for Jonathan Pollard, who is scheduled to be released on Nov. 21, 2015.

The question of an early parole for Pollard – as former U.S. naval intelligence analyst who was convicted of spying for Israel and sentenced to life in prison in 1987 – was raised at a recent Senate committee hearing.

The way the question was raised at the Senate committee suggests there may have been an intentional effort to foil an initiative for the release of Pollard, 54.

Vice-Admiral Mike McConnell, who until last January was director of national intelligence, and his successor, Admiral Dennis Blair, were at the hearing. Both are navy men, and it's their arm of the defence forces that Pollard, a civilian, robbed.

They don't forget and won't forgive.

The following was asked of McConnell. "During [former] president [George W.] Bush's recent visit to Israel, the case of Jonathan Pollard was reportedly on the unofficial agenda. During the 1998 Wye River Summit, then-director of central intelligence, George Tenet, threatened to resign if Mr. Pollard's life sentence was commuted. Are you opposed to the release of Mr. Pollard? How would the release of Mr. Pollard affect the intelligence community and our national security interests?"

Jonathan Pollard

McConnell's response on behalf of the community was clear. "We are unequivocally opposed to leniency for Mr. Pollard. This is the unanimous view of the counterintelligence community. Our reasons are still best stated in the Jan. 30, 1996, letter from then-FBI director Louis Freeh to then-attorney general [Janet] Reno and the strong stance taken in 1998 by then-director of central intelligence Tenet. Additional classified information, previously submitted to the SSCI [Senate Select Committee on Intelligence] during the years of this matter remains valid as to the grave national damage caused by this individual. Clemency for Pollard will undermine U.S. security practices and complicate U.S. counterintelligence programs."

The U.S. intelligence community has not altered its position. This is a hint to the Israeli government and its various agencies that are preparing to seek an earlier parole for Pollard.

Jewish man's killer gets death sentence in Yemen

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Yemen appeals court sentenced a Jewish man's killer to death on the same day that 16 Yemeni Jews arrived in Israel.

Abdul-Aziz al-Abdi was sentenced to death Sunday nearly three months after a lower court ruled that he was mentally unfit and ordered him to a psychiatric institution. The victim's father had appealed the lower court ruling.

Al-Abdi, a retired air force pilot, shot Jewish teacher Moshe Yaish Nahari last December in a town north of the capital of Sanaa. Al-Abdi told police that he had sent a message to Jews in the neighbourhood that they should either convert to Islam or be killed.

Also Sunday, three families of Yemeni Jews landed at Ben-Gurion International Airport to make aliyah under the auspices of the Jewish Agency.

The rescue of the 16 Jews comes after a family of 10 was brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency in March.

More than 250 Jews are living in Yemen. Following a spate of anti-Semitic attacks, as well as Nahari's murder, the Yemeni government allocated buildings to relocate approximately 50 families to Sanaa. The United Jewish Communities is working to bring 113 Yemeni Jews to a Satmar chassidic community in New York State. That has caused friction with the World Zionist Organization, which objects to the fact that the Satmars are not Zionists and believes the refugees should be relocated to their ancestral homeland.

'We try to motivate people to speak on behalf of the issue'

Speaking on behalf of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), Irwin Cotler described the events that followed the 1947 rejection by Palestinian and Arab leaders of a UN plan to establish a Jewish and a Palestinian state. The result was the creation of a Palestinian refugee population, along with "a second, almost unknown, group of refugees, namely Jewish refugees from Arab countries."

Cotler, a Liberal MP and former justice minister, said narratives of the Middle East conflict usually omit reference to Jewish refugees, focusing almost exclusively on the plight of Palestinians. Yet, around the time the Palestinian and wider Arab leadership was proclaiming a "war of extermination" against the Jewish state, Arab countries were acting against their indigenous Jewish populations – "disenfranchising them, dispossessing them of their property, arbitrarily arresting and detaining them, imprisoning and torturing them, and also murdering them," he told the parliamentarians.

Following his presentation to the deputies, Cotler addressed the Italy-Israel Parliamentary Group on Iran and the Rome Jewish community on the issue of justice for Jews from Arab lands.

The hearings in Rome were organized with the support of Fiama Nirenstein, vice-chair of the foreign affairs committee in the Italian parliament. Nirenstein has taken an interest in the issue and has agreed to champion it in the Chamber of Deputies, said Stanley Urman, executive director of JJAC.

Parliamentarians in other European democracies have likewise lent their support to JJAC's efforts to publicize the history of Middle Eastern and North African Jews. Some 850,000 were made refugees – more than the number of Palestinian refugees – but their situation has been largely ignored. JJAC contends any peace settlement involving Palestinian refugees must take into account the interest of Jewish refugees.

Bringing the issue of Jewish refugees from Arab lands to the Italian Chamber of Deputies is part of a wider educational strategy. "We have targeted the Quartet as the main international entity trying to promote peace negotiations," Urman said. The Quartet comprises the European Union, the United States, the United Nations and Russia.

"JJAC is a catalyst. We try to motivate and mobilize the most important people to speak on behalf of the issue," Urman said.

Cotler, an honorary co-chair of JJAC, who has also made the case for Jewish refugees to British MPs and the U.S. Congress, is scheduled to address German parliamentarians in early July.

The U.S. Congress has adopted a JJAC proposal, passing a law that advises U.S. diplomats to raise the issue of Jewish refugees in international forums when Palestinian refugees are cited, Urman said.

Italy is an important player on this issue, as the country hosted many Libyan and Egyptian Jews who fled their homelands.

According to JJAC's website (www.justiceforjews.com), from 1949 to 1951, 30,000 Jews fled Libya. A series of anti-Jewish laws were passed beginning in the 1950s, one of which allowed the state to seize Jewish-owned property if the owner had any contact with Zionism.

Urman said JJAC's purpose is to convince opinion makers "to accept the fact there were two victim peoples of the Middle East conflict. The Palestinians demand Israel accept responsibility for the suffering of [displaced] Palestinians. We demand the Arab world accept responsibility for the ill treatment of Jews and for losses we have suffered."

Cotler said that many people who are otherwise well informed have never heard of the "forgotten exodus" of Jewish refugees.

He suggested the remedy for the victims of this "forced exodus" included "active remembrance," acknowledgment by the perpetrators, the need for the UN to include Jewish refugees in any Mideast negotiations and to eventually provide financial restitution to Jewish victims.

"You can make the case that a proportion of that [Italian] indemnification should go to the Jews of Libya, who were double victims, of the Italian fascist regime and the Libyan government's participation in the assault on Libyan Jews," Cotler said.

Majority backs Netanyahu

A large majority of Israelis support Benjamin Netanyahu's recent policy address in which he accepted the idea of a Palestinian state, a poll found. Some 71 per cent of Israelis surveyed believe the prime minister said the right things at Bar-Ilan University and that the speech will benefit Israel internationally, according to a Ha'aretz-Dialog poll conducted the day after the speech. The poll also found that 90 per cent of voters for Netanyahu's Likud Party agreed with what the prime minister said, according to the daily Ha'aretz. In addition, some 49 per cent of opposition Kadima party members believe the party should join the coalition government based on the speech.

Israelis wary of Obama

Just six per cent of Jewish Israelis believe U.S. President Barack Obama's policies are pro-Israel, according to a new Jerusalem Post poll. Half of those surveyed said Obama's policies are more pro-Palestinian than pro-Israel, while 36 per cent said he was neutral, according to the poll of 500 Jewish Israelis by Smith Research. The results are a sharp change from one month earlier, just before Obama met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Washington. At that time, a poll by the same organization and with the same sample size found that 31 per cent of Jewish Israelis said Obama was pro-Israel, 14 per cent said he was pro-Palestinian and 40 per cent answered neutral. The poll found that only 27 per cent supported stopping building in "large settlement blocs like Gush Etzion, Ma'ale Adumim and Ariel," with 68 per cent against.

Help to Diaspora favoured

Some 60 per cent of Israelis support using their tax money to assist Diaspora Jewish communities, a new survey found. Among 18- to-24-year-olds, the support for using tax money to provide basic services such as education, health care and food to Diaspora Jewish communities was at 73 per cent, according to the annual Survey of Contemporary Israeli Attitudes Toward World Jewry, conducted on behalf of the B'nai B'rith World Center in Jerusalem. Some 54 per cent of those surveyed said the Reform and Conservative movements should receive equal status and funding in Israel as the Orthodox movement, with 36 per cent saying they were opposed. In addition, 44 per cent support the State of Israel recognizing Reform and Conservative conversions, while 49 per cent believe that only conversions performed by the Chief Rabbinate should be recognized by the state. The telephone survey of 500 Jewish Israelis over 18 was conducted June 9 to 11.

Israel's classification for investment will be changed from emerging to developed, which will boost Israeli stocks. Morgan Stanley Capital International, which provides institutional investors with popular global stock, bond and fund benchmark indexes, announced the upgrade June 16. The change will take effect next May. Merrill Lynch said the upgrade could bring $2.8 billion into the Israeli stock market, as funds that are only allowed to invest in developed markets would be able to buy Israeli stocks, Forbes reported.

Army service extended

A new program will allow yeshiva students to extend their army service and shorten their Torah studies. Launched last week, the four-year program offered to young men studying at Hesder yeshiva, which combines Torah studies with army service, includes two years of army service and two years of study. The existing five-year program combines 18 months of army service and 3-1/2 years of study. The programs will operate at the same time.

Israel and Manitoba involved in water sustainability project

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

The head Israeli scientist of the Manitoba-Israel-Mexico water sustainability research project, the Agricultural Wetland-Watershed Research Network, met with his Mexican and Canadian counterparts in Mexico City recently.

"The meeting has taken the group one step closer to establishing a definitive online resource and global information-sharing database for researchers, policy makers and the general public on the impact of wetlands situated in watersheds of downstream freshwater sources," Prof. Moshe Gophen said.

Gophen, from the Galilee Technology Center in Israel, along with two other Israeli scientists, three Canadian scientists and one Mexican scientist are involved in the project. It received a $100,000 (Cdn) grant from the province of Manitoba out of among six proposals pitched at the first-ever Water Experts Symposium in Manitoba in August 2008.

Wetlands are areas of high water saturation that attract a variety of vegetation and micro-organisms and absorb toxic carbon, phosphorus, and other contaminants and nutrients from the atmosphere. This mitigates the effects of global warming. If the wetland is located in a watershed or drainage basin of a freshwater lake, it affects the lake's water quality.

This "filtering" function of wetlands can be enhanced and can serve as a key to purifying large freshwater sources, which is important if the freshwater source is used for agriculture or human consumption.

Manitoba wishes to preserve the quality of the water in Lake Winnipeg and Lake Manitoba by protecting the large Delta and Netley/Libau wetlands on the lake's southern shores. Israel is concerned with the quality of water in the Sea of Galilee and the Hula Valley wetlands.

Prof. Avi Gafni, the project's coordinator, from Keren Kayemeth Israel-Jewish National Fund (KKL-JNF) in Israel, said that Israel has spent the last decade rehabilitating the Hula Valley and trying to reverse the damage inflicted by the drying up of wetland in the 1950s to create agricultural land. They could not have anticipated the damage that this would have on the Sea of Galilee, he said. Without the Hula Valley, Israel's lone wetland, the Sea of Galilee suffered from severe algae bloom.

Nowadays, preservation of the Hula Valley is the KKL-JNF's top priority. There is a small lake there now, called Lake Agmon ("Small Lake"), which has not only attracted flora and fauna but has also significantly improved the quality of water in Sea of Galilee. The Sea of Galilee is one of Israel's three major water sources, accounting for some 35 per cent of freshwater domestic consumption.

The "test case" that is the Sea of Galilee and the Hula Valley has answered many other mysteries about wetlands as well, including their value in providing resiliency to watersheds in times of drought, Gafni said.

"The processes of wetlands are universal, and we in Israel have been researching them intensely since the 1950s," he said.

Gafni, along with his Canadian counterpart, JNF Canada, hosts the upcoming second Water Experts Symposium, in Israel in January 2010.

"We only have one wetland and one freshwater lake, but the biological and nutrient balance of Lake Kinneret [Sea of Galilee] is the same as that desired by Lake Winnipeg – it's just that there, the scale is huge," he said.

"If Manitoba wants to take care of Lake Winnipeg, they have to address each and every wetland in each and every watershed that drains into the lake. That's about a million square kilometres. All of Israel can fit into Lake Winnipeg, but the processes are the same."

More than 20 water experts, half from Manitoba and half from Israel, will gather at the second symposium to discuss the unanswered wetland/watershed questions that remain, including the impact of over-pumping, of water level, and of fishing on freshwater sources, as well as factors affecting the water source's resilience capacity.

This time, one project will be selected, by the Manitoba government for funding from among some 20 pitches. "We hope [the symposium] will produce real results, not just on the questions of wetlands, but of other water-related issues. The challenge is not just to talk about it academically but to bring it to concrete results," Gafni said.

"We also hope to expand the symposium to include the participation of high-level water research representatives from other countries."

Australia intends to send an observer to the second conference and is expected to participate fully in the third annual meeting of its kind, in 2011.

In addition to funding the second cooperative research project, the government of Manitoba will spend $250,000 over the next 10 years on scholarships for Manitoba students to study water resources at institution of higher learning in Israel.

The collaboration between Manitoba and Israel is the second such joint Canadian-Israeli water research, with the government of Alberta involved in previous joint Canadian-Israeli water research. Gafni says that co-operation may be extended to Ontario.

"The partnership with Canada has been so productive and so fruitful for us so far. We are on a very positive path," Gafni said.

"It has been wonderful to work with the Canadian scientists. We hope that this is just the beginning of a very strong co-operative relationship."

Hungarian far-right activist facing terror charges

JTA

Gyorgy Budahazy, who was charged on several counts of arson and instigation to murder, has declined to co-operate with the investigation and threatened to counter-sue the attorney general.

Hungarian investigators believe they have established a link between Budahazy and the terrorist organization Hungarian Arrows, which has claimed responsibility for several recent arson attacks. The name of the organization is a reference to the Hungarian Arrow Cross, a Nazi military organization that murdered tens of thousands of Jews during the Holocaust.

Budahazy was present last week at the signing of collaboration accords between Jobbik, a Hungarian neo-Nazi party, and several radical rightist youth organizations.

He is believed to have established a terror unit in 2007 to spread fear among leftist politicians. Shots fired at the home of Istvan Hiller, the socialist education minister, and an arson attack on the property of Janos Koka, a liberal politician who was the minister of commerce at the time, were allegedly intended to influence parliamentary debate on health-care reforms and the national budget.

Hungarian Arrows is blamed for these as well as three similar attacks and other incidents.

Budahazy's arrest is the fifth linked to a police raid on a house in April that uncovered an arsenal of weapons and a bomb-making factory, including several devices thought to have been intended for use on the homes of politicians.

Clinton, Lieberman at odds over settlements

JTA

WASHINGTON — Hillary Rodham Clinton and Avigdor Lieberman last week reiterated their countries' disagreement over settlements.

Clinton, the U.S. secretary of state said, however, that a number of "critical concerns" will be explored in upcoming talks with special U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell.

Speaking to reporters after the two met in Washington, the Israeli foreign minister said that "natural growth" of settlements "must" continue.

"We don't have any intention to change the demographic balance in Judea and Samaria," Lieberman said, using Israel's terms for the West Bank.

But "every place around the world, babies are born and people get married. We can't accept this vision about absolutely, completely freezing settlements."

"We want to see a stop in settlements," said Clinton, who has said in the past that "natural growth" is included in a settlement freeze. "We think that is an important and essential part of pursuing the efforts leading to a comprehensive peace agreement."

Hillary Clinton

Clinton also indicated, however, that there was more discussion on the issue to come.

"We believe that this process that Senator Mitchell is quarterbacking for us has just begun," she said. "There are a number of critical concerns that will be explored in the coming weeks as Senator Mitchell engages more deeply in the specifics of where Israelis and Palestinians are willing to go together."

Reuters has reported that Israeli and western officials are discussing with the Obama administration whether projects already underway in a settlement, or cases in which money spent on a project cannot be reimbursed, could continue.

In a June 17 meeting with reporters, the two top diplomats also disagreed about the validity of understandings that Israel says it reached with the Bush administration to allow some natural growth in certain settlements.

While Lieberman said Israel wanted to "keep" those understandings intact, Clinton said there were "no informal or oral enforceable agreements" on the issue, and "that has been verified by the official record of the Bush administration and personnel in positions of responsibility."

She also noted a recent Washington Post op-ed by Dan Kurtzer, the U.S. ambassador to Israel at the time, stating that "no such understanding" was ever reached on settlements, as reflecting the administration's position. Kurtzer also was a supporter of and surrogate for Barack Obama in the Jewish community during the presidential campaign.

Avigdor Lieberman

In related developments, Mitchell said the United States continues to demand that Israel halt the "natural growth" of settlements.

In a press briefing last week at the State Department, he called "highly inaccurate" an Israeli newspaper report claiming that the Obama administration would allow "natural growth" of settlements and emphasized there has been "no change in our policy."

But when asked for a definition of the term "natural growth," Mitchell was unclear, first saying there was no accepted definition, then stating that "the most common definition" is "number of births."

"Well, of course, one of the issues is that there is no universally used and accepted definition," he said, according to a transcript. "The most common definition is by the number of births, but there are many variations of that. I've had numerous discussions with many Israeli and other officials, and there are almost as many definitions as there are people speaking. But I think the most commonly used measure is the number of births."

Asked a follow-up question, Mitchell declined to elaborate further. Mitchell also said he hoped that negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians could resume in "a matter of weeks, not many months."

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Though she's now 73, actor Millie Perkins remembers filming her titular role in The Diary of Anne Frank as if it was yesterday.

June 16 marked the 50th anniversary of the release of the film version of the famous diary, and Perkins told The CJN in a phone interview promoting the re-release on DVD and Blu-ray that she initially had her doubts about taking the role or even getting involved in film at all.

"I was 20 and a model, and wasn't fascinated with being an actress. It wasn't interesting to me," she said. "But [director George Stevens] kept calling me to come shoot the film. I didn't want to do it… until a French friend of mine told me I had to go, because she understood the importance of [the diary]."

Her decision to take the role was ultimately sealed when someone finally gave her a copy of the diary. After reading it, Perkins said she knew she had to take the part, no matter how reticent she was about dealing with Hollywood.

"I had never read the diary or heard of Anne Frank… but I knew about the Nazi atrocities because my father was in the merchant marines in the war," she said. "The diary hit me in the heart and in my soul. And I knew immediately it was something more than just Hollywood, something more important. [Anne] was me, I knew it was meant to be."

Perkins said she felt a kinship with Anne's free-spirited nature and her refusal to stop believing in the inherent goodness of mankind.

"I understood that girl," Perkins said. "Anne was feisty. She spoke her mind. She annoyed people. She had a mind of her own, and she refused to be shut up or allow people to tell her how to think or what to do. That's what I was like. The story was important [for the filmmakers] but Anne Frank was who was important to me while filming."

Perkins said she continued to be affected by the legacy of Anne Frank for several years after the film's release, when she toured to promote the film in Europe and elsewhere, encountering both "worship" and "hostility" from Europeans who were still raw from World War II events.

"It was quite an emotional experience," she said.

So much so, that Perkins openly declared her love for Israel, having visited the Holy Land on numerous occasions to tour and connect with the state that helped save the Jewish people.

"I'll be going to Israel again in October, as I've offered the Yad Vashem Society my original script from [the film]," she said. "I'm very happy about this, and I'm so thrilled to be going again."

Perkins said she's noticed an increased interest in the film and her role over the last few years, and guessed that it's because in the current state of the world "people need and want to be reminded what it is to feel. People want to feel their hearts again."

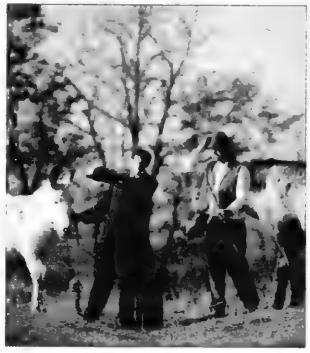
Anne Frank would have been 80 years old on June 12, and Perkins speculates that had Frank survived, she would have grown into a woman "with beauty in her soul… who would have led a fulfilled life as a humanitarian and a journalist."

Perkins credits Anne Frank for having potentially saved her life as well. Admitting that she may have gone on to model and live life with the recklessness of youth, the diary helped give her an early "consciousness… that there was something more important than just existing."

For fans of the film and the diary, the re-release by 20th Century Fox Home Entertainment of The Diary of Anne Frank: 50th Anniversary Edition contains a whack of added features, including audio commentary from Perkins and George Stevens Jr. and reminiscences by leading cast members, and the Blu-ray edition offers Millie Perkins' initial screen test, among the bonus material.

The rise and fall of a Jewish resort town

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN



The Right Road to Pontypool premieres July 1 in Millbrook, Ont.

In 1916, larger-than-life Polish-Jewish immigrant Moishe Yukle Bernstein, aware that Toronto's garment workers and their families had no relief from the sweltering city heat, opened up his Pontypool home as a summer getaway. It quickly became the place for eastern European Jewish immigrants to summer.

"The story is about the rise and fall of the town," he says. "It was a Protestant town that the Jews came to. It became wealthier because money was being spent in the community, and then it faulted away. It is a historical play based on my imagination."

In its heyday, Pontypool became the home to five Jewish resorts. Every Friday afternoon, thousands of people came by train to enjoy their weekend at this no-frills resort locale. This time in history made a deep cultural impact on the region.

"Pontypool was like a mini-Catskills, but less affluent," Poch-Goldin says. "At 4th Line Theatre, they do historical plays about the region and Pontypool is so close by.

"I was given some seed money to come up with a couple of scenes, then we did a public reading and over 100 people showed up at the Peterborough Museum. The response was really good, so they commissioned me to write the play."

The Right Road to Pontypool is directed by Kim Blackwell and features a cast of 40. Dov Mickelson plays Moishe, and the story follows his family throughout the years to the present-day story of his granddaughter, Doris Manetta, played by Ellen-Ray Hennessy, alongside Allan Price as Cousin Harry.

"I interviewed a bunch of people," Poch-Goldin says. "Doris Manetta was the person I got the most information from, and so I decided to make her a character in the play. I think Doris is charmed by that.

"It's based on characters, some fictional and some real, but the story is a factitious tale inspirited by true events. It was important that as much as I wanted to tell my own unique story, that I wasn't creating falsehoods about the place. I learned about that world."

The Pontypool lasted as a Jewish resort until the late 1970s. "I think the demise was [because] the community became wealthier over time – they would send their kids to camp and buy cottages in Muskoka and Haliburton," Poch-Goldin says.

"There wasn't much to recommend in Pontypool, other than it was cheap, out of the city and it was the community that people were comfortable with. There was a synagogue built in the late '40s – a seasonal synagogue because there were only a few permanent Jewish residents in the town."

Poch-Goldin is an award-winning playwright and actor whose work has been produced on international stages, and for CBC-TV and Bravo Television. He's also artistic director of the Planet 88 Theatre Company in Toronto. His theatre writing includes the Dora nominated Cringeworthy, This Hotel and Yahrzeit, which begins its third tour of Germany in 2010.

He has been playwright-in-residence for CanStage and Theatre Passe Muraille, and has developed work with the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, Buddies in Bad Times and Tarragon Theatre. Most recently, Poch-Goldin wrote an opera libretto for Tapestry New Opera titled The Shadow, slated for production in May 2009.

The Right Road to Pontypool runs from July 1 to Aug. 1, Tuesday through Saturday at 6 p.m. 4th Line Theatre is located on The Winslow Farm, 779 Zion Line, Millbrook. For more information, visit www.4thlinetheatre.on.ca.

'THE PLAY'S THE THING' AT TORONTO'S FRINGE FESTIVAL

The Fringe, Toronto's largest theatre festival, offers 150 productions at 30 venues, each at an affordable ticket price of $10 or under. The festival runs July 1 to 12. www.fringetoronto.com

Among the offerings is Wallace Shawn's The Fever, as performed by actor Risa Morris. The central character in this 90-minute one-woman show travels to the developing world to find herself; instead, she becomes more lost. In a fever-induced hallucination, she struggles with what it means to live in a privileged place, knowing the realities of life in the developing world. Helen Gardiner Phelan Playhouse, 79A St. George St. Proceeds of the performances go to Doctors Without Borders.

Another Fringe entry of interest is The Goodbye Rounds, by comedian Joshua Saltzman and Robert Shapiro. The play centres on Hirsch, a chronic under-achiever, who is moving to Israel to embrace a life of religious devotion. Hirsch ropes his old friend Seth into joining him, and sets forth to bid farewell to the three friends he loved best and treated worst. The exercise changes the way he sees his past, his future and himself. At Theatre Passe Muraille.

Shannon McDonough and Lori Pearlstein are co-writers and performers of Build a Bridge and Get Over It!, a comedy about finding the humour in tough situations. "One of my biggest influences for writing a play with this message was my experience working at a retirement home with Holocaust survivors," Pearlstein comments. Tarragon Extraspace.

My Mother's Jewish-Wiccan Wedding follows Claire Goldstein as she finds a new life and a new wife while discovering her sexuality, rediscovering her Jewish faith and coming out to her teenage son, ex-husband, and homophobic Jewish mother. This musical is based on a true story written by David Hein and Irene Carl. At the Bread & Circus theatre in Kensington Market. Fringe Hotline 416-966-1062.

Recently Published: The wonderful Jerusalem-based Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive recently announced the launch of two new items of note.

Fresh Wind: The First Zionist Film in Palestine, 1899-1902 by Joseph Halachmi, narrates how Theodor Herzl recognized the power of film as a tool in promoting Zionism and how he and Avraham Neufeld attempted to realize this idea in 1899. Published by Carmel and sponsored by the Spielberg Archive, the Hebrew-language book places the Zionist film in the context of world cinema.

Co-produced by the Spielberg Archive, the Jerusalem Cinematheque and Yaakov Gross in honour of Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary, the film A Legend in the Dunes uses original archival images to tell the story of Tel Aviv-Jaffa from Herzl's visit in 1898 until his casket is brought to Tel Aviv in 1949. Available in Hebrew and English versions. www.spielberg-filmarchive.org.il

By RENA GODFREY

A mural of Jerusalem that includes a mosaic of Magen Davids ascending toward the sky, with their points woven together, was painted by Arab youths at an arts centre in east Jerusalem recently.

The arts project, at the Paley Center for the Arts, an Arab community centre, was led and co-designed by Callum Schuster, a 20-year-old Ontario College of Art and Design student.

Schuster's mission, given to him by Ian Leventhal, a Toronto artist and executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada in Toronto, was to design a mural that focused on Jerusalem and its importance to the many people who inhabit the culturally rich city.

The eight-metre-wide mural was painted during after-school hours over a five-day period by 15 local, mostly Muslim Arab youths from the ages of 10 to 20.

"I was naive to expect that the students would immediately accept me and my idea of the painting," Schuster, still buzzing from the trip, said.

"As soon as I took my pencil off the canvas from drawing a Star of David, several students erased it, and I realized that I was obviously not seeing something they were seeing."

Issam Sabbah, the director of the centre, told the students, in Arabic, what Schuster's intentions and wishes for the mural were.

"You have to move on from these feelings of hate and look at things in a new light," Sabbah told them. "If we want a new future, we need to find a new way of looking at things."

Then Sabbah told Schuster to continue doing what he had planned to do with the mural, and not to let the students stop him. Sabbah drew a Jewish star again, and those who were still opposed to having the Jewish symbol included moved on to drawing another scene.

Schuster integrated Jewish, Christian and Muslim sites in Jerusalem into the mural. One girl suggested painting candles to symbolize the people who have perished on both sides of the Mideast conflict. These, too, were incorporated in the mural.

The execution of the mural and experiences gained during the process were completely different than what Schuster anticipated.

Arabs youths work on the mural.

"The final product was truly secondary. What really matters was that it was a step forward and that the students were able to drop the negative feelings for the Star of David," he said.

"The kids showed up every day with a smile on their faces, ready to paint, hoping for a new and peaceful Jerusalem. They hold the key to the future. As long as there is hope, there is possibility for change."

Spending much of his time in east Jerusalem, at the Paley Center and with Sabbah's family at his home in Siluan overlooking the City of David excavations, gave Schuster added insight into the complexities of Jerusalem. Schuster said he listened intently when Sabbah talked about his Christian, Jewish and Muslim neighbours, and the success of their co-habitation. Schuster said he felt privileged to see this different side of Jerusalem, and of Israel.

Schuster hopes to go back to Israel and contribute his talents to more coexistence projects. He has his sights on volunteering at the Ramat Moriah Community School, an Arabic and Hebrew bilingual school, as well as bringing to Toronto a travelling art show called Children of Jerusalem: Painting Pain, Dreaming Peace, created by the Muslim, Christian and Jewish students from the school.

Schuster said he is determined to convey what he's learned in Israel to his friends and family in Toronto.

Film shows creation of mural by Combatants for Peace

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Elik Elhanan, a former Israel Defence Forces paratrooper, and Bassam Aramin, a former Palestinian "resistance fighter," have two things in common.

They both lost a close family member during the first intifadah, and they both belong to the organization Combatants for Peace.

Elhanan lost his 14-year-old sister in a suicide bomb attack in Jerusalem. Aramin's young daughter was killed by an Israeli soldier during an incursion in the West Bank.

Combatants for Peace consists of former IDF soldiers and Palestinian fighters who have put down their weapons and are using active, non-violent means to resolve the conflict.

The Billboard from Bethlehem is a 60-minute documentary about a Connecticut billboard company's owner, Bruce Barrett, who proposes to Combatants for Peace that they build a giant peace mural.

The idea came about when Barrett, who directed this documentary, heard members of Combatants for Peace give a speech at a synagogue in Connecticut and was "wowed."

He approached them to do this mural in his shop, but they convinced him it would work better if they got Jewish and Palestinian kids to paint it in Bethlehem. The completed mural later hung on a giant billboard in Connecticut, on Connecticut Interstate I-95 and Route 84.

The film is mostly a collection of interviews with members of Combatants for Peace, who talk about their fighting experience and why they decided to lay down their arms.

"Occupation leads to resistance, resistance leads to oppression, oppression leads to more resistance, which leads to more oppression and innocent people pay the price. People like my sister pay the price," Elhanan says.

Although the film doesn't take sides and goes through pains to show both Jews and Palestinians as victims in a political struggle, it does have an obvious left-wing bias. It refers to "Palestine," "resistance fighters" and "the occupation" throughout the documentary.

The group Combatants for Peace has as its goal the establishment of a Palestinian state with its capital in east Jerusalem.

The Billboard for Bethlehem makes its Canadian première at the ReelHeaRT International Film Festival on June 27 at 1:45 p.m. at the Innis Theatre in Innis College, University of Toronto, 2 Sussex Ave.

It airs in a program with two unscreened films, The Sky Was Angry, about children and teens who took refuge in a theatre in Beirut during the recent war, and Marathon Beirut, an American film about 20,000 people who took part in a marathon for peace in Lebanon.

World's Yiddish theatres come to Montreal for festival

Troupes from Poland, Romania, Israel and other countries participated in historic event

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In an emotional and historic moment, members of all the major Yiddish theatres in the world gathered last week on the stage of the Segal Centre for Performing Arts in a joyous demonstration that a culture that was virtually annihilated is once again vibrant.

Representatives of theatres that regularly present shows in Yiddish participated in the Montreal International Yiddish Theatre Festival which ended June 25. Bryna Wasserman, the eight-day event's initiator, said this was the first time the theatres have gathered together in one location.

The troupes came from Poland, Romania, Austria, France, Australia, the United States and Israel to put on performances and workshops. In addition, scholars of Yiddish theatre and culture held a daylong symposium at the Segal, in conjunction with McGill University, and musicians, both local and from as far away as Buenos Aires, gave concerts of klezmer and other Jewish music.

Altogether, about 130 people from out of town participated in the festival, and there were about 35 public events.

The festival was in honour of the 50th anniversary of the Segal's Dora Wasserman, Yiddish Theatre (DWYT), one of the longest continuously running Yiddish theatres in the world, founded and directed by the late mother of Bryna Wasserman, who has directed it for the past decade.

Wasserman used a theatrical metaphor, "mending the torn curtain," to describe the festival, largely made possible by Leanor and Alvin Segal, longtime supporters of the DWYT and now the main benefactors of the Segal Centre itself.

"We are celebrating our past, but we have to look to the future," she said. She thanked the guests for keeping "the pintele Yid alive [with] your determination not to compromise when others told you to do it in Polish or Romanian or Hebrew or English or French."

At the June 17 opening, tribute was paid to Dora Wasserman, who immigrated to Montreal in 1950 from Ukraine, where she had been a disciple of Shlomo Mikhoels, director of the Jewish State Theatre. The DWYT, whose actors are volunteers, grew out of a children's Yiddish drama group Wasserman began after her arrival.

This year's festival was officially opened by 10-year-old Jordana Singer, representing the theatre's third generation. Her grandmother Lily Blander was one of the first members of the DWYT, her daughter Adina Singer is a current actor, and Jordana has begun appearing with YAYA (Young Actors for Young Audiences), the teen group.

Wasserman was remembered as "strong-willed and uncompromising" in her artistic standards and in keeping the theatre going. In a videotaped tribute, Quebec playwright Michel Tremblay described her as "someone who didn't take no for an answer."

Université de Montréal professor Jean-Marc Larrue, who wrote a history of the DWYT, doubts the theatre would still be around today had it not been for Wasserman's exceptional personality.

The festival's free outdoor Zumerfest in neighbouring Mackenzie King Park, was an invitation to everyone in the multicultural neighbourhood to join in the fun.

In interviews, the theatre people from abroad spoke enthusiastically of the vitality of Yiddish theatre.

Jacob Weitzner, artistic director of the state-sponsored National Jewish Theatre of Warsaw, said at least one play in Yiddish is presented each season. The audiences, of course, are mostly not Jewish, and they are often young and not Polish. Students come from all over Europe come to the plays, he said.

At the festival, the Warsaw troupe put on Bonjour Monsieur Chagall, an original musical celebrating Jewish folklore. Weitzner, whose parents were Polish, is from Tel Aviv, but he has been living in Warsaw for five years. He wanted to contribute to the revival of Jewish culture in eastern Europe, which he feels personally attached to.

In Israel, where Yiddish was long suppressed in order to establish Hebrew as the national language, the mamaloshen is enjoying renewed interest, especially among younger people.

Mendy Cahan, now in his 40s, founded YUNG YiDiSH in 1993 to preserve and transmit Yiddish culture. The group now has chapters in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv whose members include both the Israeli-born and immigrants from Europe, North America and even North Africa.

"What they share is not necessarily knowledge of the Yiddish language and culture, but an acknowledgement of their importance to contemporary Israeli society and culture," said Cahan, who was born in Belgium of Transylvanian parents, and speaks Yiddish fluently.

One of YUNG's biggest projects is to collect and restore Yiddish books, and it has amassed 42,000 volumes. A year and a half ago, the group opened The Lively Yiddish Museum next to the central bus station in Tel Aviv, with support from the city and the National Authority on Yiddish.

Shmuel Atzmon-Wircer, general and artistic director of 20-year-old Yiddishpiel Theatre in Tel Aviv, represents the older generation of Israel's Yiddish champions. He is adamant that Yiddishkeit is not only a culture, but a civilization whose preservation is essential to Jews wherever they live, including Israel.

Yiddishpiel's audiences were older when it began, but today are "much like the audiences for Hebrew theatre, old and middle-aged, with a growing number of young people," said Polish-born Shmuel Atzmon-Wircer, who came to Israel in 1948. He is also a veteran of Hebrew theatre and worked with the Habima National Theatre.

The interest among young Israelis is due in large part to the March of the Living, which has sent more than 20,000 Israeli teens to the sites of former concentration camps in Poland, Atzmon-Wircer said. They are sent to Yiddishpiel plays a part of their curriculum.

Yiddish got some overdue recognition a few weeks ago when the Knesset saluted Yiddishpiel and the 150th anniversary of the birth of Sholem Aleichem. The parliament declared that Yiddish, as well as Ladino, is a recognized language, like Arabic, he said.

"As long as Yiddish culture lives, the Holocaust will be remembered," he said. "Today I am one of the big fighters in the recovery from the deep misunderstanding of our founders that Israel had to get rid of Yiddish because it was a danger to Hebrew."

Alex Dafner, a founding actor and playwright with the Yiddish Theatre of Australia in Melbourne, said that for many years, he and his colleagues thought they were the only people left in the world working to keep Yiddish theatre alive. Then he attended the world Yiddish conference in London in 1998, where he met Dora Wasserman.

Born in Poland, Dafner immigrated to Australia in the 1960s, when he was 16.

For him, this festival was also a reunion with Golda Tencer, head of the Warsaw theatre, whom he knew 50 years ago in a Jewish school in Lodz. They have only met once before in Australia.

Yiddish theatre is quite healthy in Melbourne, Dafner said, because the Jewish community largely arrived after World War II. It has remained close to its culture, which has been transmitted to the second and third generations, many of whom speak Yiddish.

Two-state solution has run its course: Israeli historian

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The two-state solution appears to be back on track now that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has, for the first time and under pressure from the United States, explicitly endorsed the principle of a Palestinian state coexisting alongside Israel.

But according to Israeli historian Benny Morris, the prospects for such a solution are bleak. In his newest book, One State, Two States: Resolving the Israel Palestine Conflict (Yale University Press), he presents an argument in support of his thesis and reviews the goals of the Zionist movement and the Palestinian national movement from a historical point of view.

Benny Morris

Delving into the past, Morris – a professor of history at Ben-Gurion University whose last book was on the 1948 Arab-Israeli war – makes the point that, until quite recently, the mainstream Palestinian leadership adamantly opposed the partition of Palestine and regarded it as inalienably Arab.

By the same token, generally speaking, Zionist leaders believed that the country was the ancient patrimony of the Jewish people and could not be divided into an Arab and Jewish state. But bowing to realities, the Zionist movement moved from an initial demand for Jewish sovereignty over the whole of Palestine to a compromise position in which it accepted a division of the land.

In 1937, in a watershed event, the Peel Commission, a British body, recommended partition. The Zionist movement embraced the plan, but Zionist Revisionists dissented, as did the Palestinians. Arab opposition was fuelled by a British White Paper in 1939 that disavowed partition and envisioned an independent Palestinian state governed by the Palestinians, who outnumbered Jews in Mandate Palestine.

The concept of partition re-emerged in a 1947 United Nations resolution. In general, Jews were in favour of it, while Arabs rejected it, trying by military means to destroy the newly created state of Israel. Having been defeated in the war, the Palestinians were robbed of the opportunity for self-determination.

The idea that the entire Land of Israel, from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea, should permanently remain under Jewish control was advanced by Israel's territorial conquests in the Six Day War. Religious Zionists, in particular, perceived Israel's victory as divinely ordained and as heralding the messianic redemption, he writes.

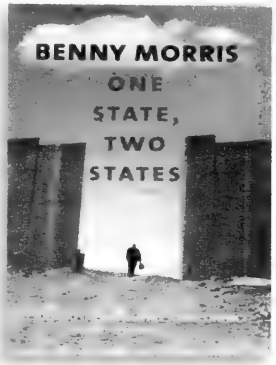
Yet secular Jews, from the poet Natan Alterman to the novelist Moshe Shamir, embraced the vision of Greater Israel, while the Israeli government hesitantly agreed to build Jewish settlements in the new territories, consisting of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, the Golan Heights and the Sinai Peninsula.

Amid a mood of euphoria in Israel, the Palestinians stuck to the dogma that Palestine was all theirs. Morris reminds a reader that, from its inception, the Palestinian nationalist movement completely rejected Jewish claims to Palestine. In 1920, the Third Palestine Arab Congress declared, "Palestine is the holy land of the ... Christian and Muslim worlds ... its destiny may not pass into other than Muslim and Christian hands."

As well, the Palestinians denounced the 1917 Balfour Declaration, which was in sympathy with the idea of a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

The rejection of partition was so deeply ingrained in Palestinian thinking that, in his book, The Arab Awakening, the historian George Antonius observed, "No room can be made in Palestine for a second nation except by dislodging or exterminating the nation in possession."

The national charter of the Palestine Liberation Organization, headed by Yasser Arafat in the wake of the Six Day War, hewed to this position, demanding a secular Palestinian state in place of Israel.



Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, however, dissident Palestinian officials, from Said Hamami to Issam Sartawi, toyed with the concept of a two-state solution. As Morris dryly notes, they were assassinated by radicals.

Nonetheless, Arafat's aide, Bassam Abu Sharif, launched a trial balloon in 1988 in which he publicly called for a two-state solution and lasting peace based on mutual recognition. Around the same time, Arafat's deputy, Salah Khalaf, reiterated the PLO's policy of a phased takeover of all of Palestine. "Nevertheless, during the following decade, the PLO appeared to inch significantly toward a two-state solution and acceptance of Israel's legitimacy," writes Morris.

By the summer of 1993, the PLO had dropped its opposition to Israel's existence. In accordance with their acceptance of the Oslo accords, Arafat and Israel's prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, exchanged letters of mutual recognition.

Several years later, the PLO amended its charter, in line with Arafat's commitments to delete the articles calling for Israel's destruction. PLO hardliners, though, insisted that the charter had not been changed.

The failed summit between Arafat and Ehud Barak in July 2000 was symptomatic of the troubles and mutual suspicions that had already surfaced in Israel's relations with the PLO.

The emergence of Hamas as a major player in Palestinian politics, Netanyahu's election as prime minister in 1996 and Israel's unilateral actions in the territories made it all the more difficult for the two sides to agree on the main issues: borders, Jewish settlements, Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

Morris claims that Arafat's successor, Mahmoud Abbas, may not be sincerely committed to a two-state solution, given his consistent backing for "the right of return" and his refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

Proceeding from this assumption, he says that a two-state solution may have run its course, primarily because "the Palestinian Arabs, in the deepest fibres of their being, oppose such an outcome, demanding, as they did since the dawn of their national movement, all of Palestine as their patrimony."

He adds, "The division of historic Mandatory Palestine as proposed, of 79 per cent for the Jews and 21 per cent for the Palestinian Arabs, cannot fail to leave the Arabs, all Arabs, with a deep sense of injustice, affront and humiliation…"

In his estimation, a Palestinian state, comprising the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, would inevitably seek more territory and try to expand, all at Israel's expense.

Is there a way out of this potential nightmare? Yes, he says, suggesting an amalgamation of the West Bank and Gaza with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

"Such a fusion of the Palestinian territories and Jordan would blunt the edge of Palestinian expansionist needs and motivations, though most likely it would still face the opposition of the fundamentalists bent on Israel's overthrow and conquest…"

Although acknowledging that this scenario will likely incur considerable dissent and disagreement in Jordan, Morris maintains that "this would seem the only logical – and possible – way forward."

Throughout this book, Morris presents himself as an arch realist without illusions. But his espousal of a Palestine-Jordan federation, and his pessimism in the feasibility and/or durability of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, may both be misplaced.

Still, One State, Two States is thought-provoking.

York must be stricter in enforcing student code of conduct: Ferman

"Most students do not attend a university to participate in political protest, and it's really out of respect for the majority of students at the university that we're recommending that Vari Hall should be a space [where] political protests are not allowed," he said.

Daniel Ferman, Hillel at York president and also a commission member, added that "universities have always been a place for political activism, but that shouldn't come at the cost of academia."

Ferman added that the university must be more strict in enforcing its student code of conduct. "If they start enforcing it on a more consistent basis, I think it will solve a lot of the problems that we're having on campus," he said.

In addition to designating alternative space for political demonstrations and enforcing the code of conduct, English said York should work to foster dialogue between members of the campus community with opposing views.

"The university could control the use of space and it could enforce the code of conduct, but without incentives and encouragement for opposing positions to be discussed and debated in a civil atmosphere, enforcement and use of space control will not work effectively," he said.

In spite of the tensions at York, English praised the university as an institution that has always accommodated its Jewish students and faculty.

"The Middle East dispute has hijacked all other activities at York to the detriment of all students, but we certainly appreciate all that York has done for Jewish students over the years," he said.

Ferman said York's task force is expected to release a report, based on all the submissions it gets from community members, by the end of August.

Ex-CFLer Cantor brings professionalism to rugby team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Noah Cantor was enjoying life after pro football, running Vera's Burger Shack, his Vancouver restaurant chain, and shooting hoops with his pals, when one of his buddies suggested he try out for Canada's Maccabiah rugby team.

He thought at first that his friend, Alex Cristall, was joking. Cantor, 38, hadn't played competitive rugby since high school, although he butted plenty of heads as a defensive lineman in the Canadian Football League from 1995 to 2006. In two stints with the Toronto Argos and one with the B.C. Lions, Cantor won four Grey Cups and was named a CFL all-star in 2004.

Apparently the rugby idea was not so outlandish. He got a call from the team's coach inviting him on the team, and before he knew it, he was working out with other Vancouver-based rugby players, preparing for the trip to Israel for the Games.

So far, it's been only "touch rugby," Cantor said. "Hopefully, it's going to be like riding a bike."

As a beefy guy – he weighs in at 255 pounds, 10 pounds lighter than his CFL days – he'll be playing forward in the second row. "It's like a lineman. They do the pushing… It's like what I did for years."

Mark Winokur, the Toronto-based head coach of the team, pointed out that Cantor is only one part of the 22-man team and may not get into games until later in the tournament. Unlike Cantor, the rest of the guys play club rugby, many at a very high level. "All these guys have a good background in the game."

Tryouts for the team were held last August in Toronto and in September in Vancouver. The bulk of the team hails from Ontario, but there are also sizeable contingents from Quebec and British Columbia. Only four players are holdovers from last Maccabiah, when the team failed to medal.

"This is a younger team, with two or three guys in their 30s," said Winokur, who was twice named coach of the year by Rugby Ontario, most recently in 2008. "The rest are in their early 20s."

Winokur, who played in the Games on the 1989 team, said the team's youth and speed and athleticism means "we'll probably play a running game," sort of like the fast break in basketball.

The Maccabiah tournament includes six countries, with teams from Canada, the United States, Israel, Australia, Britain and Chile vying for medals. Most of the other teams are mysteries, but Winokur expects the Americans to be strong, thanks to their "enormous Jewish population and tons of money."

Winokur expects most of the teams will face the same problem of creating a cohesive unit out of players that span a country. The Canadian players have been asked to get in shape and train hard, but they won't get together as a unit until they gather in Toronto in early July. The rugby team, along with other squads, will then hold a training camp to prepare for the Games.

With a fairly youthful group to mould into a team, Winokur expects Cantor "to bring a level of professionalism that the younger guys will learn from."

For his part, Cantor is looking forward to "a great opportunity to go to Israel and experience the Games. It's our Olympics, right?"

For Cantor, the Maccabiah will mark his second visit to Israel. When he was 16, he visited the Holy Land on a Jewish youth trip from his home in Ottawa. He still has great memories from that trip but he's been told the country has changed a lot since that summer 22 years ago.

Winokur, who coached the 2005 team, is likewise eager to get back to Israel. "It's a rare opportunity to play and compete against athletes from around the world and see Israel," he said.

Jerusalem is ours

By NADAV SHRAGAI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

At the end of the day and after all the speeches, the Palestinian state – and with it the State of Israel – will rise or fall on Jerusalem, the most legitimate and greatest Israeli settlement ever. This is the field where the battle should be conducted. This is where our chances are good of explaining our rights, from King David's time to 1948 and the Six Day War, without stammering and without apologizing.

When it comes to Jerusalem, there's no need to mention either natural growth or natural development. What's at stake is the nature of our connection to this city and the realization of the right that is rooted in our religion and history, and 2,000 years of memory and longing, during which the Jewish presence in Jerusalem never ceased to exist.

The Palestinian Authority and the Palestinian media no longer have any sense of the absurd extent to which they have magnified their false claims about Jerusalem. Palestinian TV reported not long ago that it's possible there will be an artificial earthquake that will cause the Al-Aqsa Mosque to collapse, because Israel was considering carrying out a nuclear test in the Dead Sea.

The mufti of Jerusalem, Sheikh Mohammed Hussein, is sticking with conspiracy theories about "the destruction of the Al-Aqsa Mosque," whether by "explosives, dropping bombs from the air or from a distance," or "by means of the tunnels." Sheikh Jamal Mohammed Bawatneh, the PA minister in charge of the Waqf, is also convinced that the "occupation regime" is seeking excuses to invade the mosque.

But it's not just a scare campaign regarding Al-Aqsa that's underway.

The Jewish presence itself in Jerusalem is perceived these days as a desecration of the Muslim character of the city. Thus Marwan Abu Khalaf, the director of the Institute of Islamic Archeology at Al-Quds University, says that "under every stone and in every corner, on every street and at every bend in Jerusalem, there are remains that say: 'We are Arab, we are Muslim.'"

Mahmoud Habbash, the PA minister of agriculture and social affairs, persists in saying that the Temple was not located in the Holy City at all, while researcher Hasan Sanallah is critical of the use of the term "Wailing Wall." According to him, "The occupation is falsifying the facts, and it has no right to the walls of Al-Aqsa."

With such a Jerusalem narrative, it's no wonder the Palestinian Authority – and not just Hamas – is defining Jerusalem as land that Muslims are religiously required to fight for and hold on to, liberating the land for the sake of Islam. This, of course, comes in addition to the Palestinians' denial of the Jewish connection to Jerusalem.

It's not difficult to undermine these lies. Indeed, according to many interpretations, the Al-Aqsa Mosque mentioned in the Qur'an - which many say appeared to Muhammad in a dream - was originally in the seventh heaven of Mecca and Medina, and not a terrestrial place at all. Nor is Al-Aqsa mentioned at all in the verses from the Qur'an that adorn the interior walls of the Dome of the Rock. Moreover, Muslims' journey to Jerusalem is always theologically considered a visit rather than a pilgrimage. It should also be noted that Jerusalem was never the capital of this land in the days of Muslim rule.

But while all this is correct, it is ultimately of negligible importance.

The main thing is to tell the Jewish story of Jerusalem again and again, a story that is unequalled and without which the Jewish people would not have undergone a revival in the Land of Israel. It should be told without tiring, without blinking and without getting confused, either by those among us who are mistaken or who mislead others, or by those who pose an external threat.

PEACH-LACQUERED CHICKEN

3 garlic cloves
1 3" piece peeled ginger, coarsely chopped
2/3 c peach jam
1/3 c soy sauce
2 tblsp water
1/4 tsp hot red pepper flakes
1 chicken cut in 1/8's or chicken parts

Preheat oven to 350°. Process garlic in food processor. Add ginger until finely chopped. Add jam, soy sauce, water, red pepper flakes and pulse until sauce is combined.

Lightly oil or spray baking pan with cooking spray. Place chicken pieces in baking pan. Season with salt. Pour sauce evenly over chicken. Bake 1 hr., basting several times inbetween to ensure even browning.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My dear girlfriend, Amanda, and I were sitting in an outdoor cafe enjoying a glass of wine with dinner when she pulled out her Blackberry to read a text message that had just come in.

It was from her current love interest, Randy. He texted her to let her know that he was cancelling their date for Saturday night because "something important came up." He also added that he has been rethinking their relationship and would not be calling her for a while, as he feels he needs a little space right now.

To say our dinner was ruined would be an understatement, but more than the breakup, we were both shocked that Randy, who we thought was a decent guy, would do this kind of thing via text message. Amanda was in tears.

Has the world gone mad with texting or is Randy just a misguided creep?

Texting Trouble

Dear Texting Trouble

The old saying "It takes all kinds" comes to mind. You can rarely go anywhere these days without watching people walking, driving, eating or working out while doing the two-thumb tango on their smartphones.

Let's face it: there's no nice way to dump someone, but breaking up through a text message is an all-time low. It's like a high-tech "Dear Jane" letter, only it takes even less effort.

Randy's actions show a total disregard, lack of sensitivity and respect for Amanda. All it did was demonstrate that Randy is a coward who used his texting skills as a crutch and an easy way to get out of dealing with a difficult situation.

There can't be any closure with a text message or e-mail breakup. Ending a relationship should either be done face to face or, at the very least, in a phone conversation. With the world of texting gone mad, I'm sure this new "breakup via text" phenomenon has become more popular. No muss, no fuss, no accountability.

I'm sorry, Amanda, but any guy who doesn't have the moral fibre to break up with his girlfriend using proper communication is not worth shedding tears over, let alone ruining a dinner with a good friend.

'Visioning' the future

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

I regularly comb bookstores and check magazine newsstands for books and magazines with articles, ideas and images that I know will bring people closer to their joy, bliss and passion in life.

So even though I had heard for years about vision boards and "visioning" the future you want to create, I was recently struck by a book called The Vision Board: The Secret to An Extraordinary Life, by Joyce Schwartz. I really want to share what it's all about.

A vision board is a tool that will help you discover who you are and ultimately help you achieve what you want more of in life. It is recommended that you do a visioning session in a group led by a facilitator, but you can certainly try the process alone. To help you, there are some excellent suggestions in the section called "The Passport to Possibility."

To get started, Schwartz recommends gathering several different kinds of magazines. Make sure they are not the usual kind of publications you read and pick at least three different magazines. Just glance at the pictures and then pull out a bunch of pictures that appeal to you. When you have at least eight to 10, lay them out, look at them, shuffle them and put them into some kind of sequence. Grab a pencil and pad of paper and write down some key words, and see if there are any links between the pictures. What is your interpretation of the images? What do these pictures tell you? Summarize your thoughts in a paragraph of advice to yourself.

As Schwartz writes, "one picture may be worth a thousand words," but she recommends the next step is to have a personal vision statement – one word or phrase that you "craft to visualize your best possible future." She recommends that you draft this personal vision statement before you create your vision board.

Find key words that match your core values, because your vision statement will be driven by your strongest personal values. So what do you value? What's important to you? List your top 10 values. Take the following values and put them in order from most to least important: acknowledgment, excitement, family, freedom, friends, honesty, money, power, recognition, reputation, respect, security and spirituality."

Come up with a "motto mojo," which is the redrafting a popular motto, cliché, slogan or line from a song, or even a family motto you grew up with. Some examples are: "The sun will come out tomorrow" or "Life is a bowl of cherries."

Keep a journal and jot down ideas when they come to you.

Create a wish list. Write down what you are grateful for and your top five best memories, achievements, successes or things that you are the most proud of. Then write down the five top experiences that you want to create in your life. So for example, Schwartz wrote: "To create and promote this book, so it is listed in the top 10 of the New York Times bestseller list."

You can use crayons, ribbons, markers, fabric and colour to create your vision board. Throw in affirmations, power words, quotations, pictures and photos of celebrities or influential figures who make a difference (Oprah is often featured in people's vision boards), and make sure to keep your vision board in a place where you can see it every day.

"Your vision will become clear only when you can look into your own heart," Schwartz says. "Who looks outside, dreams: who looks inside, awakes."

Cdn. astronaut visits Ramon's family

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Canadian Space Agency president Steve MacLean was in Israel last week for the third time since the tragic death of his Israeli colleague and close friend Ilan Ramon aboard the space shuttle Columbia, which exploded during its re-entry to Earth on March 1, 2003.

"The first time I came to Israel was for a very sad reason. It was for the funeral of Ilan Ramon," MacLean told The CJN.

He came to Israel for the second time in February 2007 for a memorial ceremony at Ramon's gravesite, and to visit schools, hospitals and airbases to speak about Ramon and the importance of space science.

Steve MacLean

This time, he came to Israel for a happier occasion: the graduation of Ramon's son, Assaf, from the Israeli Air Force (IAF) pilot training course.

"The day Assaf got accepted into the Israeli Air Force, I promised him I would be at his graduation," said MacLean, who attended the ceremony and air show with his wife and one of his daughters last Thursday at the Hatzerim Air Base in the Negev, where Assaf Ramon received his wings and his officer's ranks.

The amazing part about it, MacLean said, was that seeing Assaf graduate reminded him of a photo Ilan once showed him from his own IAF graduation ceremony. "They look a little bit alike. I found it quite emotional."

Assaf Ramon, who was the valedictorian last week, told Israeli daily Yediot Achronoth in April 2006, on his induction into the IAF, that he intended to follow in his father's footsteps. "Israel must send another astronaut," he was quoted as saying.

Graduating from the training course was the first step in that direction, a step formerly taken by Ilan Ramon, who was a colonel in the IAF before joining NASA.

"It is impossible to tell what the future holds," MacLean said. "But [Assaf] certainly has the character and all the qualities to become an astronaut. He graduated first in his class from the top flight-school in the world. He is well on his way."

Dead Sea Scrolls on display in Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

After months of promoting the historic Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at Toronto's Royal Ontario Museum, the organizers eagerly welcomed people from all backgrounds to explore the scrolls and other artifacts that offer Jews, Christians and Muslims a link to their past.

The Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) and the ROM have collaborated to produce the exhibition, which opened last week and will be on display until Jan. 3 in the ROM's new addition, the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal.

Sixteen scrolls, discovered in 1947 buried in caves in the Judean Desert by a Bedouin shepherd, will be divided into two groups of eight and each group will be on exhibit for three months.

Among the 16 scrolls – written between 250 BCE and 68 CE, from the books of Genesis, Deuteronomy and Psalms, as well as the sectarian Community Rule, War Scroll and Messianic Apocalypse – are four that will be on public display for the first time ever.

The News in Brief

Canada

Exam Question Pulled

VANCOUVER — A controversial practice-exam question about Mideast politics has been pulled from the British Columbia education ministry's website after protests from the Jewish public and Canadian Jewish Congress. The multiple-choice question was meant for teens studying for province-wide Grade 12 history exams. It asked them to identify the following group: "They have been fighting to regain a homeland since they were driven out in 1948. Some have lived their entire lives in refugee camps. Forty years later, Israel still refuses to recognize their right to exist as a nation." Answer choices were Jews, Iranians, Egyptians or Palestinians. Congress spokesperson Romy Ritter said the question oversimplified a complex issue.

Ex-Guard Can Stay

OTTAWA — A Federal Court judge has rejected an effort by B'nai Brith Canada to overturn a cabinet decision to let a former Nazi guard stay in Canada. In 2001, a Federal Court judge ruled that Ukrainian-born Wasyl Odynsky was a guard at a forced labour camp in Trwainiki, where German SS killed most of its Jewish prisoners in a 1943 massacre. The judge ruled he was confined to barracks during the killings and that he served involuntarily and wasn't a Nazi, but also that he likely lied about his service to enter Canada. B'nai Brith argued this alone justified revoking his citizenship. On July 19, Judge Robert Barnes ruled, contrary to the group's claim, that cabinet made a fully informed decision. He ordered B'nai Brith to pay Odynsky's legal costs, Canadian Press reported.

World

Shchitah Reaffirmed

BRUSSELS— New European Union rules to make slaughtering animals more humane also recognized the validity of religious slaughter methods. EU farm ministers agreed June 22 to tighten rules on slaughter to minimize animals' suffering. The new regulations allow kosher meat to be traded and sold freely in every EU country. They also recognize that animals being slaughtered for kosher consumption can't be pre-stunned, which violates shchitah laws. In addition, kosher meat won't be labelled in a discriminatory way.

Jew Elected Speaker

LONDON — A Jewish MP has for the first time been elected speaker of the British House of Commons. Tory John Bercow, 46, was elected by his peers in a secret ballot. His faith has not played a role in his political life. However, when Prime Minister Gordon Brown congratulated him, he noted that Bercow was the first-ever Jewish speaker.

Canada Joins Shoah Education Task Force

OSLO — Canada is now a full member of the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research (ITF), Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney announced last week.

Canada's application for full membership was accepted during the ITF's plenary session in Oslo.

"Membership in this important body provides Canada with an opportunity to work internationally to combat racism and anti-Semitism," Kenney said. "This government believes it is critically important to be engaged in efforts to teach future generations the lessons of the Holocaust and help prevent future acts of genocide."

To become a full member, Canada had to complete a study on the state of Shoah education, remembrance and research in Canada, as well as a project with ITF members.

For its project, Citizenship and Immigration Canada and B'nai Brith Canada, in partnership with the U.S. State Department, the French foreign ministry, the U.S. Holocaust Museum and the Memorial de la Shoah, hosted a recent conference in Toronto that examined Canada's actions and attitudes before and during World War II, including the refusal in 1939 to accept passengers of the MS St. Louis, some of whom later died in the Holocaust.

At the conference, Kenney announced funding for a new National Task Force on Holocaust Research, Remembrance and Education.

As a full ITF member, Canada commits to promoting the Declaration of the Stockholm International Forum on the Holocaust through remembrance, research and education. The ITF, which now has 27 member countries, works to get political and social leaders to support Shoah education and research nationally and internationally by funding training programs and educational material.

York conference on Israel met by protests

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Last week's three-day York University-sponsored conference on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was met with three days of protests from concerned members of the Jewish community who feared the event would promote an anti-Israel agenda.

According to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), when the latter organization assigned three people to attend Israel-Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and paths to Peace, their fears were confirmed.

"The conference devoted virtually no time to suggestions about an invigorated peace process and concentrated instead on Israel as a military machine determined to dominate the Palestinians," the organizations said in a joint statement.

"There was no discussion of terrorism or Israel's security needs and there were no speakers who presented an Israeli centre-left or centre-right perspective. The assumption that Zionism and Israeli society are based on violence and racism predominated.

"At one panel discussion, 'Zionists' were blamed as the cause of domestic violence perpetrated by Palestinian men against Palestinian women. At another, some participants questioned the sanity and integrity of an Israeli presenter. Speakers who defended Zionism were often jeered and heckled and virtually all of the publicly available material was anti-Israel."

B'nai Brith Canada called the conference "a blatant exercise in anti-Zionist propaganda," and other Jewish and Israel advocacy organizations – including the Jewish Defence League (JDL), StandWithUs, the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism (CCIA), Hasbara Fellowships and Hasbara at York – held protests at the entrance of York's Glendon campus at Lawrence and Bayview avenues, where the conference was held between June 22 and 24.

JDL's national director Meir Weinstein said on June 22, at the peak, about 125 people gathered for the protest and on the 23rd and 24th, the protests drew smaller crowds.

In a release distributed by UJA Federation, CIJA and Hillel of Greater Toronto, Daniel Ferman, Hillel's city-wide student-council chair, said the conference "is academically flawed and unbalanced.

"It's disappointing that a university which publicly supports 'reasoned discourse' would sanction a conference with so many speakers whose rhetoric falls far below this lofty goal," Ferman added.

The IAA and the ROM

The logo of the Israel Antiquities Authority (Reshut Ha'Atikot) conveys within its modest, simple design a profound statement about the timelessness of Jewish history and the everlasting inter-connectedness of the Jewish people.

The stylized seven-branch candelabrum (menorah) is an ancient symbol that owes its Jewish association to the fact that the menorah was part of the religious ceremony in the Temple in Jerusalem. Well before the construction of the Temple, a menorah also travelled with the Israelites during their 40-year wandering in the desert.

From the editor's desk...

The menorah was identified with the Temple. It represents a very specific place – Jerusalem. Over the years, various likenesses of the menorah were used throughout the world, for example on gravestones, to denote the presence of Jewish individuals.

The two circles above the base of the menorah, as the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) explains on its website, depict Torah scrolls. The circles, we are told, are "a Jewish motif that accompanies the seven-branch menorah from the time of the Talmud until the present day."

And it is no wonder.

It is in those scrolls that the menorah is first mentioned. Those scrolls, lovingly carried across time and place, have defined individuals as Jews and groups of Jews as Jewish communities. Those scrolls have connected and continue to connect Jewish communities to one another across the globe.

The circles represent the Jewish people.

Through its very compelling and exciting work, the IAA per-petates understanding of the connection between a very special place and a very special people.

The IAA was founded in 1948, some 2-1/2 months after the State of Israel was created. It is the leading professional body for the study of archeology of Israel. It is also in charge of the country's antiquities, the antiquity sites, the excavation of the sites and the preservation, conservation and study of the artifacts yielded by those sites.

William Thorsell, director and CEO of the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM), described the IAA as having "a deep level of scholarship and caring." He spoke those words at the media preview of the exhibition of Dead Sea Scrolls: Words That Changed the World.

Together, the ROM and the IAA have undertaken what Thorsell described as "one of the most significant exhibitions in the history of the ROM."

For nearly six months, from June 27 until Jan. 3, the ROM is showcasing a specially curated exhibit of more than 200 artifacts lent to the museum by the IAA. The centrepiece of the exhibition are 16 of the Dead Sea Scrolls that contain fragments from the books of Genesis, Deuteronomy and Psalms. Four of the fragments will be on display for the first time ever.

The exhibit has been masterfully curated by former Torontonian Risa Levitt Kohn, director of the Jewish Studies program at San Diego State University.

ISRAEL ANTIQUITIES AUTHORITY רשות העתיקות

The arrangement and display of the artifacts are an esthetic tour de force. The exhibition tries to make the visitor "feel" the desert, marvel at the splendor of Jerusalem and stand in wonder of the mountain singularity of Masada. The route for the visitor through the exhibition replicates a route in ancient times through the hills of Judea to the Galilee centre of Sephoris, back to Jerusalem and then farther south to the Dead Sea redoubt of Qumran, where the scrolls were discovered.

Even the colours of panels, the walls and the display fabrics are the beiges, golds and light brown of Judea and the nearby area dominated by the Dead Sea.

Most important, however, is the aspiration of the ROM and the IAA to lead visitors to a wider, deeper appreciation for the impact of the scrolls on the culture and humanity of the world.

Thorsell emphasized this. "The exhibition," he said "was about values and ideas. It was intended to generate discussion about the meaning and the significance of the scrolls."

"The exhibit," she wrote, was "a highly unique opportunity for a Canadian audience. Among the scrolls are some of the oldest discovered texts of the Hebrew Bible – writings that have had lasting influence on western culture as they continue to resonate today. This exhibition tells an important story of discovery, as these scrolls and their words shed light on the life, faith and culture of ancient Judea at the dawn of modern Judaism and Christianity."

This special collaboration between the ROM and the IAA is to be praised, and it should be seen by as many of us as possible. To be sure, the treasured antiquities that the IAA has lent to the ROM demonstrate the unique connection between the Land of Israel and the Jewish people. But as the exhibit organizers also wish to point out, they prove a common starting point for the fostering of inter-ethnic, inter-national goodwill that is demanded of us all if the world is to be the best place it can be for all its inhabitants. — MBD

Correction

The story "Panel addresses anti-Israel 'crisis' on campus" (CJN, June 25) contained two errors. It incorrectly identified the event's organizer. It should have said the event was organized by the Jewish Defence League of Canada. In addition, the event was held at the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre on Chabad Gate in Thornhill, Ont., not at York University. The CJN regrets the errors.

PRIDE PARADE: More than 100 people, gay and straight, organized by Kulanu, a Jewish LGBT social group affiliated with Hillel of Greater Toronto, marched in Pride Toronto's parade on Sunday. Tens of thousands of people gathered on Yonge Street to watch the parade, and watchers cheered loudly as the pro-Israel marchers passed. Marchers included Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber; Len Ruder, CJC's regional director, and Phil Berger, chief of the department of family and community medicine at St. Michael's Hospital.

United Chesed is desperate for funds

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Zev, 46, had no money to feed his five children, United Chesed stepped in to help.

Now he's working for the organization, a not-for-profit charity that assists members of the Jewish community who are experiencing financial hardship or living in poverty but don't meet the requirements of other social service agencies.

"My business had failed, and I lost my home. We had to live with relatives for two weeks until we found a house, and my bank account was zero. I couldn't put food on the table."

He wasn't able to get any emergency help until he was referred to United Chesed, who gave him food coupons and a commitment to help out with $800 a month to help pay the bills.

"Once the pressure was off, I had the mindset to move forward. My life turned around," said Zev, who preferred not to give his last name.

During his first day at work, he delivered $245 worth of groceries to a mother with four young daughters. "The little girls hadn't eaten yet that day. We should never have to see these things."

Brian Price, a Thornhill dentist who founded United Chesed seven years ago, said these two cases aren't unusual. "When we say people need money, they really need money. They need food and clothing for their children, and they need beds."

> 'We have hundreds of people who are out of work'

When he placed a recent ad in The CJN saying the organization urgently required help, "I was practically crying. We said that our 'Jewish brothers, sisters, children, parents and grandparents are bleeding', and we meant every word."

In these tough times, he said, the organization is being forced to grow bigger, "and we don't want to grow. We need $40,000 to $50,000 a month to survive, and we're not coming close to that. We have very little overhead, and the money we receive goes right back to the people, but we're able to help only a fraction of those living under the poverty line."

Ruth Rebuck, United Chesed's executive administrator, said that every charity is having a difficult time raising money.

"Poverty is not sexy. It is a reality, and people can't cope with it. They look away. Poverty is shameful and people don't want to face it," she said.

"We're talking about people's lives, though. When they're hungry, we have to help. I can't rest if someone is desperate."

Price said United Chesed helps in a number of ways. "When we heard about a pregnant woman who had no health insurance, we found an obstetrician and anesthetist willing to work for free. There are people out there who want to help."

Last Pesach, a company distributed a roast and 10 pounds of ground beef to 10 families. "These people had no words to say thank you," he said.

Rebuck said that although United Chesed doesn't set out to find people jobs, she will send out resumes to contacts, and she has been successful matching employers and employees.

"We have hundreds of people who are out of work. It can happen to anyone. No one is safe."

Price said that "there is only so much we can afford to do. We need the basic necessities to help people survive."

He would like to help hundreds of more people, he said.

"I'd like to see a resource centre for jobs and housing, and I'd like to get our name out there. Too often, people don't call until they're desperate. They've fallen through the cracks."

Camps take swine flu precautions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish camps were being vigilant last week about screening for the H1N1 virus, but none reported any suspicious cases of flu among campers or staff.

Rabbi Elliott Kleinman, chief program officer for the Union for Progressive Judaism, the umbrella body for Camp George in Parry Sound, Ont., said staff sent out letters to parents telling them not to send their children to camp if they're feeling ill.

"We told them to keep their kids home for a few days, and we told the staff the same thing. We take the health and safety of our campers and staff seriously."

> Campers' temperatures taken upon arrival

He said that the camp would be taking campers' temperatures when they arrived and would "push basic hygiene such as washing their hands and covering their mouths when they cough or sneeze."

At Camp Shalom, Canadian Young Judaea's camp in Gravenhurst, Ont., director Adam Shulman said his staff would also be taking campers' temperatures and asking them a series of informal questions about their general health.

"We do a regular lice check when campers arrive, and this will be part of that check," he said.

"We checked with physicians and the Ontario Camping Association, and this is the protocol they suggested. We're trying to be preventative and pro-active. We won't hesitate to send a camper or staff member home if they're sick."

At Camp Ramah, located in Utterson, Ont., campers had their temperature taken before they got on camp buses from Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa and four American cities, and at Camp Gesher in Cloyne, Ont., staff screened campers for fever and planned to teach basic hygiene.

"We have hand-washing stations all around the camp," Gesher's director, Shaul Zobary, said.

Meanwhile, two Jewish camps in Texas last week reported cases of swine flu. Camp Young Judaea and the Greene Family Camp, both overnight summer camps, will remain open, the Jewish Herald-Voice in Houston reported.

Camp Young Judaea had eight cases, including campers and staff, as well as 25 campers and two counsellors quarantined with flu symptoms. The Greene Family Camp had one confirmed swine flu case and four campers with symptoms.

Swine flu also affected the start of at least three other Jewish-sponsored camps in the United States.

The Reform movement's Camp Newman-Swig in Santa Rosa, Calif., delayed its opening after some staff came down with the flu, while at the movement's Camp Coleman in Georgia, 15 staff came down with flu, delaying the opening there.

As well, at the Conservative movement's Camp Ramah Darom in Georgia, several campers came down with flu and were to remain isolated for a week.

Restaurant 'warns against' Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A posh downtown restaurant inserted itself into Middle East politics last month when it advised its clientele to avoid the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM). The restaurant later removed the Internet posting.

On June 18, Le Sélect Bistro told visitors to the "What's Up" section of its website that it wished "to warn against a show whose artifacts were obtained by force and looting."

The exhibit "showcases artifacts seized by Israel in its 1967 surprise war which it waged against its neighbours," the site stated. "The war led to the seizure and the ongoing military occupation of many lands, including the West Bank, from where the scrolls were taken."

The one-paragraph summary goes on to accuse the ROM of "violating Canada's responsibilities under the UNESCO Conventions and Protocols relating to cultural object seized by arms."

That posting, which included a graphic red "X" over a ROM poster publicizing the exhibit, was changed to a more neutral description that omitted allegations Israel looted the scrolls, but maintains that a "controversy" concerning the scrolls still exists.

Before it was changed, the Select posting was being circulated on the Internet by individuals angry at the restaurant's views.

Mel Fogel, a semi-retired teacher, said, "I read it. It was outrageous. They described the 1967 war as if Israel engaged in a surprise war.

"If the owner of the restaurant is prepared to engage in that kind of behaviour and misrepresent the facts, especially the '67 war, obviously he's anti-Israel."

Fogel suggested that anyone upset by Le Select's inaccurate description of the scroll's provenance should consider doing to the restaurant what it suggested doing to the ROM exhibit – stay away.

Frédéric Geisweiller, owner of Le Sélect, said he wrote the original web posting, which ran for three weeks until it was removed on June 19. The site was changed in part because "the ROM was willing to acknowledge some" of the things we were acknowledging about the exhibit," he said.

Geisweiller said the original description of the exhibit warned the restaurant customers to be "cautious" about the exhibit, but it didn't explicitly call for a boycott. "I want the story of the Dead Sea Scrolls told," he said, adding that Palestinians, the Jordanian Antiquities Department and the École Biblique in Jerusalem excavated them.

Those scrolls were placed in the Rockefeller Museum in Jerusalem and Israel removed them after its victory in the 1967 war, Geisweiller said.

These are the scrolls on display at the ROM, he continued, adding that the ones purchased by Israelis from antiquities dealers were likely now in private collections. (In fact, they are part of the collection at the Shrine of the Book in Jerusalem.)

However, in a letter to Geisweiller (which was circulated on the Internet), Howard Adelman, a York University professor emeritus in philosophy, addressed point by point the assertions contained on le Select's website.

After criticizing Geisweiller's use of the website "to propagate clearly political views and propaganda," Adelman noted that the site of Qumran was a site settled by Jewish Zionists under the British Mandate who were forced out when Jordan occupied the West Bank in 1948; that Jordan, which itself "seized and annexed" the West Bank, did not make the export of antiquities illegal until 1974; that international protocols on protecting cultural property during war only apply to contracting states, and the Palestinian Authority does not qualify as such; that the 1967 war was not a surprise attack by Israel but only followed Egyptian closure of an international waterway. Adelman added that Jordan entered the conflict after Israel had asked it to stay out, and that the Rockefeller Museum was a private institution that Jordan expropriated and which Israel, as a successor authority, took possession of in 1967.

Adelman also noted that the scrolls are "clearly the cultural property of Jews 2,000 years ago. Given many precedents on cultural property, would you not think the Jews of today should be the inheritors of that property, even if ownership of the property is in dispute?"

The ROM exhibition, which runs until Jan. 3, 2010, will take place despite the protests of Palestinian officials, who argue the scrolls were acquired illegally from the Jordanian-owned Rockefeller Museum in Jerusalem. In Mississauga, Palestine House called on the ROM to cancel the exhibit, saying they "were looted from a museum in East Jerusalem after it was occupied in 1967."

Museum officials and Canadian government officials have rejected that contention.

The Dead Sea Scrolls, authored by Jewish scribes from 250 BCE to 68 CE, were found in 1947 in a cave by a Bedouin shepherd near the ancient village of Qumran. They were turned over to an antiquities dealer, as were other scrolls located in caves near the ancient Essene settlement. Many of the scrolls were purchased by Israeli scholars at various times before 1954.

An unmistakable message

It was to be expected. The clerical elite of theocratic Iran have closed ranks behind their supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Khamenei, it will be recalled, last week closed ranks behind President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and severely disparaged the defeated presidential candidates and the people still protesting the results of the June 12 presidential election.

The rulers of Iran have now added brazen intimidation and harassment to the brutal suppression of the peaceful pro-democracy protesters. And of course, they have pointed their accusing fingers at their western scapegoats for inciting the pro-democracy protests.

According to reports, Ayatollah Ahmed Khatami, one of the most powerful individuals in the country, last Friday said the protest leaders were "at war with God" and should be punished "without mercy." "They are worthy of execution," Khatami warned.

Taking their cue from the fulminating Khatami, the Iranian security forces substantially buttressed their already considerable number in Tehran. Some 10,000 Basij militiamen were reportedly deployed throughout the city to help "control" the demonstrators.

On Sunday, Iranian authorities detained eight local employees of the British Embassy in Tehran for allegedly taking part in the post-election demonstrations.

British Foreign Secretary David Miliband called the detentions "harassment and intimidation of a kind which is quite unacceptable." European Union foreign ministers were said to have agreed that the EU would meet any Iranian intimidation of European diplomatic staff in Tehran with a "strong and collective response."

It is difficult to imagine what that "strong and collective response" might be. Thus far, the EU has failed every test that the the government of Iran has placed before them. Following the recent American example, the Europeans have been reluctant to impose meaningfully effective and biting sanctions upon Tehran in relation to the mullahs' nuclear subterfuge.

Canadian leaders are genuinely disgusted by Tehran's behaviour. "The regime has chosen to use brute force and intimidation in responding to peaceful opposition regarding legitimate and serious allegations of electoral fraud. Basic human rights are being ignored," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said last week.

"This is a regime that has denied the reality of the Holocaust, that's attempted to develop nuclear weapons, and long before the election we knew this was a regime with which we could not have normal relations. Canada cannot abandon the people of Iran," Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff has said.

The Khamenei-Ahmadinejad rulership, alas, appears to have beaten down the will of their own people to live by truer democratic standards. Western inaction regarding the events in Iran will send an unmistakable message to the Iranian rulers and to all other anti-democratic despots in the world about the sorrowful state of western resolve when it comes to affirming the much vaunted sanctity of human life and the democratic ideal that underpins it.

An Arab attempt to expel Israel from the Universal Postal Union was rejected by a secret ballot vote of 73-32. Western diplomats said it was a major political success for Israel. Although the expulsion wouldn't have had a significant impact on postal service, it would have sent a precedent for Israel's removal from other international bodies.

Jewish refugees from Arab countries

I read with great interest "Italian deputies learn about Jewish refugees" (CJN, June 25) and was pleased to see appropriate recognition for MP Irwin Cotler and his able representation of the history of Jewish refuges from Arab countries before the Italian parliament under the sponsorship of Justice for Jews from Arab countries.

I was especially struck by the fact that coinciding with Irwin's address was the visit of Libyan President Moammar Gadhafi to Italy. This quite appropriately allowed Cotler to ask why Libya has done nothing to compensate the Jews forced out of Libya following the establishment of the State of Israel.

I do note, however, that The CJN missed the fact that also present at this same meeting in Italy was Toronto's own Walter Arbib, a former Libyan Jew who today is one of Canada's most respected philanthropists. Arbib acted as special emissary for the Canadian Jewish Congress at the Rome gathering on Jews from Arab countries.

Congregation welcomes gays, lesbians

In her letter, Aurora Mendelsohn raises the issue of shuls not openly welcoming GLBTQ congregants ("Jewish gays, lesbians not supported," CJN, June 25). Gays and lesbians have not only been welcome at Congregation Shir Libeynu since its founding 13 years ago, but have also been front and centre here. Our recent third annual GLBTQ Pride service, Going to Shul with Pride, was attended by more than 70 people. Led by our ritual leader Aviva Goldberg, our service included alternative liturgy, songs, readings and a communal aliyah for our GLBTQ congregants.

We also have High Holiday services, and we have Shabbat services the first Saturday of every month at 10:30 a.m. at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Our liberal congregation is very diverse. Many of our congregants, both GLBTQ and straight, say that Shir Libeynu is the first shul where they felt truly welcomed. We hope that anyone looking for a shul to call their own will visit our congregation. For more information, visit www.shirlibeynu.ca.

A diatribe against the Jewish People

Regarding, Gilbert Plaw's defence of Seven Jewish Children ("Judge Seven Jewish Children for yourself," CJN letters, June 4):

• The play is about the Jewish people, not just Israelis. The title shows that. We see it in the constant repetition of the lines "tell her," "don't tell her" – what Jewish parents should or should not tell their Jewish daughters and in the Holocaust episodes, which occurred before Israel became a nation.

• The structure of the play is circular. It begins with the Holocaust and ends with the attack on Gaza, which in the play becomes another kind of Holocaust, against the defenceless people of Gaza. The victims become the perpetrators in their deliberate, cold-blooded attack on innocent people. That is the ironic point the playwright wants you to accept.

• The play assumes from the start that Israel has no right to exist: "Don't tell her she doesn't belong here."

• The play is hardly more than a diatribe against the Jewish People. References to Palestinian rockets and bombs are seen as snide Jewish rationalizations to justify Jewish cruelty. Theatre is essentially conflict. Here there is only a pretense to conflict, nothing to show the constant fear Israelis have been living under in their fight for survival.

• Oh yes, there is some conflict in the play's beginning, where we see the heart-rending decision a parent must make in telling her child about what might happen or did happen in the death camps. But that soon becomes only a theatrical device for the playwright to drive home in one appalling paragraph the horrors inflicted on the poor Gazans. What kind of mother would tell her child that "I laughed when I saw the dead policeman," that the Gazans are filth, that they're animals living in the rubble? Here the circle is complete, with the attack on Gaza joined with the Nazi destruction of the Jews. This is not conflict. This is not theatre.

Grandson to participate in Maccabiah

Our household is filled with excitement, and I am proud to tell you this little story. My grandson, Max Grossman, from Toronto, will be representing Canada in the 2009 Maccabiah Games in Israel. He will be playing basketball in the 16-and-under age group. Well, 50 years ago, his grandfather, by the same name, also played basketball in the Maccabiah Games, representing Canada. How times flies, but I am just as excited today as I was then. I wish all of our athletes a safe trip and the best of luck.

Let's curb the hyperbole about York

By ERIC LAWEE

There's no denying that York University's 50th anniversary year has had ups and downs. Most obviously, although the "winter term" did finally end, it did so in June, after a strike that shut down classes at York for months.

The campus is now relatively quiet, but loud rumblings from within segments of the Jewish community continue to reverberate when it comes to York, especially regarding anti-Israel activities on campus and the adverse impact they have on the quality of the Jewish student experience. Some verdicts have been especially harsh. For example, a full page ad in the National Post published by a prominent Jewish advocacy organization gave York a "report card" in which the university received straight "Fs" in subjects such as "providing balanced, intellectual academic debate," "preventing anti-Israel agitators from spewing hatred," and "ensuring Jewish students are not marginalized and intimidated." The only passing grade (an "A+" no less) was for "seeking community support while anti-Jewish activity takes place on campus."

To be sure, supporters of Israel and many Jewish students have had much to lament in recent months, not the least of which is a conference held at York last week that, while ostensibly "mapping paths to peace" in "Israel Palestine," featured a raft of virulent Israel-bashers, including some who routinely deploy the scurrilous language of "Israeli apartheid" and seek a "one-state solution" to the Israeli-Palestinian impasse – that is, the founding of a "bi-national state" on the ruins of the Jewish one.

York has also gained unenviable notoriety due to strident anti-Israel demonstrations on campus and a deplorable incident in which police intervention was required to escort besieged students from the university Hillel. In that case and others in recent years, the university's response has been slow and muted. Little wonder that many are upset and others outraged.

> 'Leave the rhetoric of blanket demonization to the anti-Israel zealots'

Before, however, declaring York the academic equivalent of Sodom and Gomorrah (or Durban II), I would urge consideration of the matsav (situation) at my home institution in an enlarged perspective. Here are some items that I think merit consideration as we seek to achieve positive outcomes on a campus that is still home to more Jewish students than any other in Canada.

First, a little history. Jewish studies at York, and a strong Jewish presence there, stretches back to the university's inception. York augmented its early commitment to the field of Jewish studies by creating a Centre for Jewish Studies (CJS) in 1989, the first interdisciplinary research and teaching centre in Jewish Studies in Canada. The CJS now has a new name, the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies, due to the centre's generous endowment by the Koschitzky family. The centre's ability to promote Jewish studies on campus and beyond has never been greater. Such things do not happen in an institutional vacuum. York's support has been unstinting and continues unabated, so no failing grade here.

York also boasts a new Jewish studies program that allows students to major and minor in the field. It was created with strong encouragement from York's upper echelons. Some program offerings are rare in any university outside Israel, such as courses conducted in Hebrew with texts studied in the Hebrew original. By their nature, such courses attract smaller enrolments, so sustaining them requires support from department chairs and deans. At York, such support has routinely been forthcoming.

York encompasses innovative initiatives such as the Jewish Teacher Education Program, which trains students to teach in a range of Jewish day schools and the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education, which helps York students and partner universities in Canada, Germany, and Poland develop curricular responses to racism and anti-Semitism. For these "A+" programs, the university deserves credit rather than blanket vilification as a place where Jewish students are "marginalized and intimidated" or, as a petition I recently saw proclaimed, a place characterized by "hate and intimidation targeting Jewish students."

But what about Israel? Again, without discounting unacceptable incidents that have occurred at York and some of the disturbing larger trends that they betoken (trends that, sad to say, are hardly limited to York or to university campuses), I would note that York has just inaugurated a program that brings a visiting Israel studies professor from Israel to campus each year to do research, teach, and give public lectures.

Needless to say, the visiting professorship promotes academic ends, not political advocacy. At the same time, by teaching students at the undergraduate and graduate levels (and the wider community, through public lectures) about Israel's challenges, achievements, shortcomings and endless complexities in a nuanced way, using a variety of scholarly approaches, the Israel studies visiting professors take students beyond the screaming headlines – and the screaming demonstrators who too often populate York's Vari Hall.

As scholars who model and impart habits of rigorous, open-minded critical analysis, these professors serve, as all professors should, as an antidote to tendentious propagandizing of any sort, Israel-related or otherwise. In addition to communal support, the program receives strong support, moral and financial, from York, and should be counted as another feather in York's cap.

And speaking of Israel, it's worth remembering York's generous policy, unmatched in Canada as far as I know, when it comes to granting university credits to students who spend a year in Israel studying at yeshivot, seminaries, or like institutions after high school.

Of course, for students on campus, the quality of the university experience has much to do with the extracurricular sphere. Here, York students enjoy advantages hard to find on too many other North American campuses, from the vibrancy of York's Hillel, to the variety of the speakers of Jewish interest who appear on campus, to the delightful cuisine of the kosher cafeteria (the latter a true rarity on a North American campus). Let us note also that when some years back York Hillel invited Daniel Pipes – a strong but controversial, pro-Israel voice – to speak on campus, the administration of the day made sure he was able to do so, despite strenuous protests from many on campus, and beyond.

Other aspects of some of the attacks on York emanating from the Jewish community trouble me, apart from their lack of balance. For one, although I am the first to agree that what happens at universities matters and has repercussions far beyond the campus commons, I worry that the focus on York is becoming too total, displacing other pressing priorities. A full page ad in a major newspaper is a major expenditure. Are those dollars really best spent attacking York?

More than I worry about the allocation of scarce community resources, however, I worry about our community's ability to keep its head and retain its own sense of "balance" in challenging times. In addition to that petition mentioned earlier, entitled "Stop York University Hate and Intimidation Targeting Jewish Students," I recently received an e-mail that spoke of "the bigotry and racist agenda of York University towards Israel and the Jewish community." Fighting words those, but also ones that are wholly unjustified. Leave aside the fact that there really is no monolith called "York University" but only the messy parts of a complex and dynamic whole, typically acting autonomously from one another. The point is that such baseless criticism diminishes the Jewish community's credibility on campus and threatens to destroy much that has been painstakingly built – and will not easily be rebuilt or replaced.

Perhaps more importantly, criticisms such as these are simply unfair to the many at York who expend time, energy, and resources in order to enhance Jewish life on campus, build academic Jewish studies and, yes, even help to sustain events and programs that benefit the embattled Jewish state. (For example, York International, York's international education office, contributes to our successful efforts to send a large contingent of York students to study at Israeli universities on a yearly basis.)

Evidence-based responsible criticism is the lifeblood of the university and any university worthy of the name should welcome it. We must engage in trenchant criticism where appropriate, while also remembering to bestow praise where deserved. But we should leave the rhetoric of blanket demonization, whether shrill or sophisticated (the latter being increasingly the more dangerous form when it comes to the assault on Israel within the academy) to the anti-Israel zealots who, as we know, paint a fraudulently one-sided picture of a country living amidst an extremely complex and often unspeakably trying reality.

As we formulate out letters, petitions, and advertisements, let us recall Pirkei Avot's wise maxim: "Scholars, be careful with your words." Let our community be distinguished by prudent, fair-minded, lucid thought and discriminating, measured speech – on campus and off.

Opinions

Because we care

Alaska governor Sarah Palin was in the news recently. To her credit (and I'm not a fan), she was in New York City to raise funds for autism. At the end of one news item about her, the reporter included the following: one of Palin's own children is developmentally challenged. Why was it necessary to inform us of her personal situation? Were these her reasons for involvement? Was the underlying assumption that she was marching only because of her personal connection?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

People often get involved with charities that promote or cater to issues they're personally connected to. I understand that. If someone you love is stricken with a disease, it seems quite natural to want to focus on the illness, to get funding for research and to raise consciousness so that others will embrace the cause.

Yet we err if we assume that people only get involved when they are personally touched.

Many of you know that I have been crusading for agunot (women who can't get their Jewish divorce) for more than 35 years. In all that time, people have consistently assumed that I was once an agunah. So let me confess publicly in this column: I was never divorced. I have been married to Rabbi Howard Joseph for 44 years. My parents were not divorced.

I didn't take up the cause of Jewish divorce because I knew of the problems personally. I took it up because I was and still am outraged at the injustice of our supposedly just legal system. I can't sit idly by while Jewish women are chained to dead marriages. What kind of Judaism allows men to use Jewish law to abuse law-abiding women.

I got involved because of the cause. Just like many of you!

Volunteering to help or to promote a cause or to raise money can't be limited to the issues that touch me or those I love. We are more than that. We can be moved by ideas, by problems others face, in other communities and other places. We can imagine. We can extend our concerns. We can be responsible for those we don't know. Because we care.

Maimonides describes our charitable obligations as a series of concentric circles. First you take care of your immediate family. Then you move to your extended family, then the community, the nation, the land you live in, etc.

We must move out beyond ourselves in our acts of volunteering. Remember the words of Hillel: If I am only for myself, what good am I?

Important to heed the lessons of the past

The recent death of Amos Elon sent me back to our bookshelves to re-read some of his work. Elon was a passionate observer and critic of modern Jewish events and history, and his Jerusalem: City of Mirrors (published in 1989) seemed just as apt today as it did 20 years ago.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

For example, in the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War, he observed in regard to the recapture of east Jerusalem: "Fervent expectations soon produced spectacular results. Tombs of renowned Hebrew prophets and kings… as well as Saul's own throne and Samson's alleged cave were being discovered almost daily."

Fast forward to 2009, to my morning paper. The caption under a picture of a tallit-shrouded man reads: "Overlooking the tomb of Joseph, one of the holiest sites in Judaism."

Since when is the putative tomb of Joseph one of our holiest sites?

Or take Elon's description of the "Tomb of David" on Har Zion. Built by the Crusaders, it remains the imagined site of David's tomb, despite having a very Muslim-looking sarcophagus; and it is draped with a cloth inscribed, "David, King of Israel, lives."

Not much has changed since Elon wrote his book. We are still in the throes of messianic expectations, the search for signs of an imminent miracle.

Elon did get one thing wrong, however. He argues that in regard to Jerusalem, political decisions are rational, whereas collective memory is not rational.

But political decisions have not been rational. The creation of the State of Israel was not a rational act but a desperate one, one based on the necessity of history, infused with dreams and born of tragedy. The 1967 war was not a miracle, but a brilliant military achievement carried out by actual people.

Once we recognize that our images of Israel and Jerusalem, of the shrines discovered and venerated, are artifacts of memory as much as of history, we may approach rational thought. Not before.

Why then, do we harangue Palestinians whose memories so bedevil a search for peace? Why should we be different? Buffeted by the same Zeitgeist as all other nations – radical, reformatory, conservative, fundamental – we, too, live in a confused amalgam of rational, factual truths and a mist of memory.

The accumulation of shrines has a long history in Judaism, just as it has in Christian and Muslim traditions. "The religious imagination always invented – still invents – its own geography," Elon wrote.

However, today, when we venerate such places as the "tomb of Joseph" we are assigning a specific meaning to it, in crass political terms. We are saying that Jews can settle in that place because we have been there since the time of Joseph, whose bones were brought by Moses out of Egypt and buried in the Land of Israel.

I suggest that this kind of geo-religio-political nonsense stop. Elon subtitled his book "City of Mirrors," I believe, because everyone in this tormented city sees what he or she wants to see reflected in so-called sacred sites.

Yeshayahu Leibowitz, an ardent Jew, observant in every way and a fierce Zionist, saw the danger in assigning metaphysical meaning to physical space. The Temple Mount is not holy because a building stood there, he argued. Holiness, sacredness, is given when the people who occupy it give it meaning.

What meaning do we give to a mythical tomb – where a Crusader or an Ottoman is buried? To the Western Wall, build by the despicable Herod, now so holy that only certain groups may approach it?

By our actions, we sanctify or desecrate a place. By our actions, we make the world a better or a worse place.

We do a terrible disservice to ourselves when we insist on making "sacred" every inch of soil. Israel, our beloved Israel, now grapples with internal strife that threatens to tear the country apart. Is this the dream that we share?

Have we forgotten the lessons of these scholars and teachers and abandoned ourselves to some twisted version of a dream that leads only to hatred and destruction?

On citizenship

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies to everyone in Canada and, in some instances, to those outside of Canada who are subject to Canadian law extending beyond our borders.

Of course, the charter grants some special rights that apply only to Canadian citizens but not to everyone residing in Canada. Canadian citizens have the right to vote and the right to serve in office if elected. Canadian citizens have the right to enter, remain and leave Canada. And Canadian citizens can take advantage of guarantees in certain circumstances of minority language education. The right to vote could be extended to non-Canadians, a matter of current debate within the City of Toronto. But only Canadian citizens have a constitutionally entrenched right to vote. Surely, however, citizenship means more than these particular provisions in our constitution.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Apart from our First Nations peoples, Canada is essentially a nation of immigrants. There have been some six million new citizens since the enactment of the first Citizenship Act in 1947. Before that, Canadians were considered British subjects. But, to quote Gabe de Roche of the Institute for Canadian Citizenship, this "did not reflect the character of our nation."

Recently, the Institute for Canadian Citizenship was established to promote "the idea that citizenship is one of the most important bonds we share." This organization, co-chaired by Canada's former governor general Adrienne Clarkson and John Ralston Saul has established six pillars of Canadian citizenship. They are economic security, social networks, legal status, political participation, cultural identity and public discourse.

There are, however, some current issues of considerable controversy surrounding the notion of Canadian citizenship. Of particular interest to Canada's Jewish community, in recent years, Canada has had to deal with the question of the revocation of citizenship of persons designated as "war criminals."

The leading case involves Helmut Oberlander and his activities during the World War II. Pursuant to the Citizenship Act, the minister responsible referred Oberlander's case to the Federal Court to determine whether he had obtained Canadian citizenship by "false representation or fraud or by knowingly concealing material circumstances." Following this decision and subsequent judicial hearings, Oberlander was stripped of his Canadian citizenship in October of 2008.

Most recently, Bill C-37, amending the Citizenship Act, came into effect on April 17. The new act deals with four distinct legal scenarios under which people lost Canadian citizenship and provides for the acquisition and/or restoration of their citizenship. Among those affected by the new legislation were some of the so-called "war brides" and their children. War brides were European women who married Canadian servicemen during World War II and returned to Canada with them.

Another issue that has attracted considerable attention relates to children born abroad to Canadian parents born abroad. Under the new law, children born in another country will not be Canadian citizens by birth if they were born outside Canada to a Canadian parent who was also born outside Canada to a Canadian parent. In effect, the new law limits Canadian citizenship to the first generation born to Canadian parents outside of Canada. Some have alleged that this creates "two-tier Canadians."

Of course, citizen issues are tied to the whole question of immigration. Jason Kenney, the minister responsible for immigration and citizenship, recently said that immigrants to Canada should be competent in either of Canada's official languages before becoming Canadian citizens. He also remarked that "integration does not mean assimilation." While new Canadians do not have to cut themselves off from their religion or customs, he feels that they should embrace a new "Canadian identity."

In Israel, issues relating to immigration and citizenship take on a different significance. Jews around the world have the opportunity to make aliyah and become Israeli citizens under its 1950 Law of Return.

The underlying notion behind the law of return relates to the growth and viability of Israel and its continued preservation as a Jewish state.

It also serves to guarantee a safe haven for Jews from discrimination and repression experienced in many counties around the world both historically and even today.

Given the demographic reality of modern Canada, issues surrounding immigration and citizenship exert a major influence on this country's economic, social, cultural and political fabric.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Canada leads in fight against anti-Semitism

By JASON KENNEY

Guest Voice

A lesson I learned some time ago is that it is far more important to decisively demonstrate the principles you live by than to simply talk about those principles.

The government of Canada is committed to the fight against anti-Semitism and racial intolerance and our actions demonstrate that commitment.

We acted decisively when we became the first of many nations that refused to participate in the recent Durban Review Conference. Participating in discussions that are underpinned by hateful ideas serves only to validate those ideas.

Our commitment has also been at the heart of Canada's two-year effort to achieve full membership status in the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research (ITF), which culminated on June 24 in Oslo, Norway.

Now, as a full member of the ITF, Canada is proud to join with 26 other countries to work worldwide to increase public awareness of genocide and develop learning opportunities about the Holocaust.

Regrettably, Canada hasn't always been a champion of human dignity. Canada has its own unfortunate history of anti-Semitism that we must acknowledge and learn from.

Last month, our government, in collaboration with B'nai Brith Canada, hosted a conference in Toronto titled "The St. Louis Era: Looking Back, Moving Forward." The conference examined Canada's actions during World War II, including our country's refusal in 1939 to provide a place of refuge to passengers aboard the MS St. Louis, some of whom, tragically, later perished in the Holocaust.

The MS St. Louis incident and other wartime measures, such as the internment of British Jewish refugees in Canada, are a shameful part of Canadian history that must be acknowledged, confronted, and taught. While Canadians have a strong general knowledge of the Holocaust and of genocide, recent research by Léger Marketing for the Association of Canadian Studies also showed significant knowledge gaps among Canadians.

Our government is also taking concrete steps to break down barriers between cultures in Canada. Recently, I announced funding for an innovative project that brings young Somali-Canadians together with established Jewish-Canadian professionals in the spirit of cooperation and intercultural understanding. I sincerely hope this will become a model for future projects engaging many other communities in Canada.

When I think about the importance of the fight against hatred and intolerance, I will forever remember two recent visits overseas. Last November, I paid my respects at the Babi Yar Holocaust site in Kiev, a ravine where more than 33,000 Ukrainian Jews were killed over two days in 1941 by Nazi war criminals.

A few days after I visited Babi Yar site, an attack in Mumbai, India, left 164 people dead, including Rabbi Gavriel Holzberg and his wife, Rivkah, at Chabad House. I visited Chabad House, the synagogue and Jewish community centre in January and was sickened to think that this peaceful place could be targeted in this manner.

Sixty-eight years and thousands of miles separate the ravine of Babi Yar from the debris of Chabad House, but those two sites are connected by the same hatred, the same dehumanizing of innocent people. As Prime Minister Stephen Harper stated in response to the attack on the Chabad House, anti-Semitism "is a pernicious evil that must be exposed, that must be confronted, that must be repudiated whenever and wherever it appears."

Solving a 'sexy' crisis

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

It takes great moral strength to be a public servant. As guardians of the public purse, they must decide where to spend money and, equally importantly, where not to. It is thus inevitable that their decisions will cause some to suffer. Increased spending on health care may come at the expense of the education budget. Increased funding for the police may mean less for public transportation. And the list goes on.

Making such decisions is not for the faint hearted or the morally weak. With so many competing interests and the impossibility of knowing the full impact of one's decisions, mistakes are inevitable and fully excusable – provided one's motivation is to act in the public interest.

However, when decisions are motivated by personal career ambitions, or even by the desire to help a favourite charity, then one must bear the moral brunt of and responsibility for the harm one has caused. It is this exacting standard for public officials that serves as the basis for denying office to those who are not morally fit and for the weekly communal prayer for those "involved faithfully in communal needs."

Unfortunately, such leaders, especially among our democratically elected political officials are few and far between. This moral failing of leadership, which is a theme we have discussed on these pages in the past, is more evident during the challenging economic times we are currently facing.

A small but instructive example of the lack of moral integrity of our leaders is the short-lived controversy surrounding the unfortunate but revealing comments of Lisa Raitt, the minister of natural resources, on the life-threatening shortage of medical isotopes used in the treatment of cancer and heart patients.

The minister was caught on tape saying that the crisis represents a "sexy" career challenge with much benefit to accrue to the one (namely herself) who would solve the crisis. What is sexy about people dying is something that perhaps only a true politician could understand. Compounding the problem was her delay in apologizing, leading one to suspect the apology may have been politically motivated and thus morally worthless, if not repugnant.

Since it came on the heels of her firing her aide for leaving confidential papers in the CTV Ottawa offices, we might have thought this would be grounds for a reprimand. We would have been sorely disappointed. She received the full backing of Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and the "gaffe" quickly faded from memory.

Harper also announced that the nuclear plant that had been producing nearly half the medical isotopes used worldwide would not be reopened. What strikes me as disheartening is the apparent lack of public outcry about how to solve the crisis and how the nuclear plant was allowed to deteriorate to this point, and the apparent acceptance of such insensitive comments as par for the course.

While such a display of crass political opportunism in the face of human suffering is unfortunate, public figures need not and should not let the helping of individuals be their primary focus. Rather they must take a more global approach, balancing the needs of the public as a whole, even at the expense of some individuals.

A government is within its moral right to increase spending on education, or even a cultural centre, despite the possible negative repercussions on health care. It is for this reason that Jewish law forbids paying exorbitant amounts to redeem hostages. While the family may suffer untold grief, the needs of the nation take precedence.

Ultimately one's motivation is something that is known only to oneself and our Creator. We can only hope and pray that our leaders are motivated to act in the best interests of those they must serve.

Thoughts on finishing Kaddish

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

If my arithmetic is correct – and it may not be – I've said Kaddish for my father more than 1,600 times in the past year.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, spiritual leader of my synagogue, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am in Toronto – as well as others who have lost a parent – cautioned me early on that finishing the traditional 11 months of Kaddish can be emotionally difficult.

May 23, my last day as a Kaddish-sayer, was sad, but also unexpectedly gratifying.

From the beginning, I found the whole experience compelling. At its simplest, there was something fulfilling about accomplishing what I had set out to do.

A friend in Seattle, Joanie Diskin Saran – a third-time Kaddish-sayer who lost her mother shortly before my dad passed away – advised me by e-mail last summer that keeping busy "may make you feel less pain at the time, but eventually you have to feel it and work through it."

I took her advice to heart. In part, that meant persisting with Kaddish even though there were challenges to overcome.

One of the first was Birkat Hamazon, the blessing after meals that we sang at post-service breakfasts and after seudah shlishit, the evening meal on Saturdays. I'd heard my dad lead it many times, and it took two months before I could get through it dry-eyed.

I came to think of Birkat Hamazon as a personal test – an emotional thermometer, of sorts. And virtually every day after the first couple of months had gone by, I was satisfied with the feedback it gave me.

The calendar was another stumbling block. We lost my dad unexpectedly, and when the Hebrew date on the wall calendar was changed daily between Minchah and Ma'ariv services, I felt at first that I was being pulled too quickly in a direction I didn't want to go.

But I never considered stopping. Initially, my mother, my sister and I were guided by instinct and the example my dad had set. Soon, we had new reasons to want to continue.

Saying Kaddish together was a tremendous bonding experience for the three of us. We also bonded with fellow Kaddish-sayers and minyan regulars.

As a first-time mourner, I was in uncharted territory. It was reassuring to compare notes with others on how we were dealing with our individual losses. I hadn't anticipated that by going to services, I would have built-in sounding boards, advice-givers, and a whole new group of shul friends.

I found it grounding to start the day with a predictable routine that included prayers for peace, a blessing on the earth and good health for those who are sick.

The recitation of Kaddish, which praises God, is believed to elevate the soul of the deceased person. I felt it connected me with Judaism, my synagogue, and fellow mourners – past, present and future.

Becoming involved with other aspects of the service was a way of connecting, too.

For approximately the past eight years, women have been eligible for Torah honours at our shul, which is affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism. I learned how to wrap the Torah for glilah, an honour I'd never had before, and which – to be honest – I'd never aspired to.

> 'I had no clue I would laugh as much as I did at shul. I had no clue I would laugh there at all'

It was even more of a stretch for me to be called to the Torah for the first time. It helped to recall that, at a previous service, a man I didn't know, returning to his seat after an aliyah, confessed how nervous he had been.

But the kicker – the thing that people have no idea about – is that we also had fun. I had no clue I would laugh as much as I did at shul. I had no clue I would laugh there at all.

We shared old pictures and funny stories. We joked about some of the quirks that are unique to our minyan, and we never seemed to run out of things to talk about over coffee and bagels. Why would I want to leave?

But in March, I opted to play hooky for the first time since I had started saying Kaddish. My daughter and I went on a four-day cruise, a welcome break for both of us.

Although I felt it was the right decision for me, knowing I had Kaddish back-up was comforting. In addition to my mother and my sister, a cousin who felt close to my father also said Kaddish whenever he was in shul this past year.

In a way, I thought of my trip as a rehearsal for stopping. I missed being at services when we were away, but the hiatus reassured me that I would be OK when the time came to finish.

I had mixed feelings about the imminent 11-month mark until a woman I know told me that she had continued to attend some weekday services for the final month of her 12 months of mourning.

I liked the idea of not quitting cold turkey. I decided I would continue to wake up early and divide my mornings between the gym and shul, at least for a month.

As our last day of Kaddish approached, friends asked how I was feeling about it. "I'm OK," I would say. "I have a plan."

Knowing that I would be back, especially some weekday mornings, buffered the emotion I was bound to feel on the final day.

My mother, my sister and I said Kaddish for the last time at a Saturday Minchah service.

Shortly after we sat down for seudah shlishit, Michael Rubin, Beth David's ritual director, told me he would like someone from our family to lead Birkat Hamazon.

My reaction surprised a few people – myself included – who knew that, at services, I often avoided eye contact with Mike in the hope of not being chosen for an honour.

I wanted to lead Birkat Hamazon. It would be hugely symbolic for me to end my 11 months by leading the blessing that had so challenged me at the beginning. After checking with my mom and my sister to see if they would be OK with it, I asked my husband for back-up if I needed it, at the parts I was less confident about.

My sister had paved the way by leading Birkat Hamazon following breakfast on two occasions, only the first of which threatened my composure.

When I started to lead Birkat Hamazon on our last night of Kaddish, David Grad – a fellow Kaddish-sayer and new shul friend – caught my eye across the table.

He pointed at me and stage-whispered to my husband, "She's actually doing it."

I felt I'd come full circle as I recalled how Birkat Hamazon used to make me cry.

At the Ma'ariv service, Mike asked my mother, my sister and me to change the calendar. There were three components to be changed, one for each of us.

Local doctor runs medical aid program in Dominica

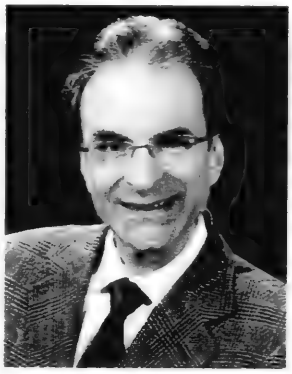
By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Peter Newman, a North York family physician, has received the Ontario Medical Association's Presidential Award in recognition of exceptional and longstanding humanitarian service to the community that brings honour to the medical profession.

Newman accepted the award – he was nominated by the Toronto district of the Ontario Medical Association – at a recent ceremony and dinner held at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

A graduate of University of Toronto's medical school, Newman, now an assistant professor at U of T, has practised medicine in Vancouver and Israel, as well as the tiny eastern Caribbean island nation of Dominica.

He has served on the North York General Hospital's president's advisory committee, the executive of the department of family medicine, and the executive of the medical advisory committee.



Dr. Peter Newman

A co-ordinator of continuing medical education events with a special interest in international content, Newman is the founder and co-ordinator of the Canada-Dominica Outreach Program, which combines medical aid to Dominica with training for post-graduate residents.

The seeds for this program were planted, Newman said in an interview, after he volunteered in Dominica, and remained in touch with people there. "It is a poor country in the Caribbean – one of the poorest in terms of resources."

His idea, he said, was to send residents to Dominica – the population is about 75,000 – for about one month of their training. The program benefits both sides. The residents get credit, and the patients receive care. Residents also provide information to Dominican health-care professionals.

Since 1991, he said, he has sent down about 100 health-care professionals, including social workers and psychologists, from graduate programs across the country, who work in community health clinics and in outlying villages.

"My goal is to expose young Canadian [health-care professionals] to the challenge of working in under-serviced areas. The ones that do go always come back excited and brimming with enthusiasm. They learn how to work as part of a team and with nurse practitioners."

He hears "heart-warming" stories, he said. "Residents have told me about intervening to make an HIV-positive patient understand about safe sex, and a lot of stories about helping to organize the care of patients with chronic illnesses such as diabetes or heart disease."

> Recognized for exceptional and longstanding humanitarian service to the community

Newman's job is to meet with prospective residents, prepare them for their work, and liaise with the minister of health in Dominica.

One of his biggest challenges is arranging housing, he said. "[The Dominican government] can no longer afford to provide housing, so we have to fundraise here to pay for the housing and airfare," Newman said.

"These days, doctors graduate with huge debts, and most can't afford to pay for this on their own. We've raised money from individual and corporate donors, and North York General Hospital has a fund earmarked for this program."

> 'My goal is to expose young Canadian [health-care professionals] to the challenge of working in under-serviced areas'

Among his work in continuing medical education he has spoken in Mexico and in Trinidad – he speaks Spanish, Hebrew and French – to the Pan American Health Organization about Canada's experience with SARS.

He has also arranged talks in Alaska for Canadian doctors to learn about native healing. "They learn about traditional healing methods, herbal medicines, and the psychological effects of complementary medicine. It is interesting for the Canadian doctors who practice evidence-based medicine."

Newman, a father of four and grandfather of two, said he has always been addicted to travelling. "I'm fascinated by other cultures. It has been a lifelong interest. My work in other countries has come about because of this."

In his earlier days as a physician, he said, he was a doctor on a kibbutz in the Upper Galilee. "I was the first civilian doctor in the Golan Heights after the Six Day War, and I was monitored by the International Red Cross. I had to speak to them in French, to the nurses in Hebrew, and then it all had to be translated into Arabic. It was challenging."

His connection to Israel has been very strong since then, he said. "I'm a strong supporter. It's an incredibly dynamic country."

Newman stressed that the Presidential Award "could have gone to thousands of people. I'm humbled at being singled out, and I dedicate the award to all hard-working physicians."

Local oncologist shares knowledge worldwide

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

World-renowned gynecological oncologist Dr. Allan Covens is one of just a few surgeons who can perform a procedure to remove cervical cancer while preserving fertility.

Covens, who has been doing the laparoscopic procedure successfully for about 17 years, has given countless women the opportunity to have children, even after having surgically removed the cervix and a small part of the vagina near the cervix.

Once the cervix is removed, suturing is used around the lower part of the uterus where the cervix once was, so that when a woman does conceive, the uterus can support the weight of a developing fetus.

With this kind of expertise, Covens – the head of gynecologic oncology at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre in Toronto and a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the University of Toronto – is happy to share his technique with doctors all over the world.

"We've trained a lot of people. We have a formal training program at the University of Toronto and we take people from Canada and elsewhere in the world. We've trained a lot of people, including a number of Israelis," said Covens, the author or co-author of more than 65 peer-reviewed publications and three textbooks, and the recipient of 30 scholarships and awards.

Covens is beginning to organize a medical workshop to be held in Jerusalem next April.

The workshop will be modelled after one that he used to arrange every two years in Toronto.

The Alon Dembo Memorial Workshop – named after Dembo, a "very well-known, very respected" radiation oncologist who died of leukemia in his 40s – began in the the early 1990s, Covens said.

"That ran for about four meetings – eight years – and it was very good, but it became hard to maintain. A small number of people organizing the meetings – it just became tough. The last meeting was in 1999," Covens said.

He said when he was in Israel nearly three months ago to train six or seven Israeli fellows in gynecological oncology, one of his former fellows suggested organizing a meeting in Israel of Israeli and Toronto-based doctors.

"I thought it would be a good idea, but I suggested we make it a little bigger. I thought, 'Why don't we call it a Dembo meeting and organize it like a Dembo meeting and invite anybody who'll come, open it to the international community?'" he said.

"I thought, 'It's a great idea. We've got a lot of people who we've trained, we know them well, we're good friends with them.'"

Although his decision to have the Dembo meeting in Israel was not a political decision, his involvement with Doctors Against Racism & Anti-Semitism (DARA) was based on his discomfort with the way the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has crept into the medical world.

"There are a lot of Jewish physicians who feel that the political agendas have gone a bit too far and have crossed boundaries into things that they shouldn't," Covens said.

He was referring to the fact that the Lancet and the British Medical Journal have, in recent years, been publishing anti-Israel articles.

This year, the Canadian Medical Association Journal ran two pieces that were critical of Israel's role in the recent war with Gaza.

"Here are a couple prominent journals that all of a sudden seem to be moving in a political direction. I think it's totally inappropriate," Covens said.

"There has been a level of activity that has been going on for several years, but I think the medical journal articles were the last straw. I think a lot of people, Jewish physicians, felt that enough is enough. This is inappropriate, this is wrong, and I don't think a lot of us feel comfortable in being totally silent about it anymore."

He added that he doesn't see or experience anti-Semitism in the hospitals, but said, "I think it's just beneath the surface."

He said some people are working with the strategy that the more attention they pay it, the more prominent the issue becomes.

"That may be, but that was a very common message that was used in 1937, and look what happened."

He said there are countless countries all over the world that are in "gross violation" of human rights. But those countries don't get the negative attention that Israel does.

New president aims to revitalize Jewish National Fund

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Frank A. Wilson wants to revitalize Jewish National Fund of Canada.

"My vision for JNF is to create a national footprint for the organization, to be visible… and make people understand what JNF does. We're not just trees and water, we're a lot more. Without JNF there'd be no Israel. We are the Land of Israel," he said.

Wilson, 66, who took over as national president last month – succeeding Sharon Marcovitz Hart – told The CJN in a recent interview he plans to increase co-operation between his organization and others in the Jewish community and is intent on making sure all JNF Canada employees and volunteers are on the same page and can move forward as one.

"I created an organizational chart and a board members' guideline," something that had not existed previously in the organization, he said.

"Our mandate is, and always will be, to raise money for the State of Israel," Wilson said. But he added that under his tenure, he hopes to position the JNF as something more.

Frank A. Wilson

"I am looking to train young leadership in Canada," he said. "We have one of the greatest brands in the world... especially with our work on the environment. Consider that JNF trained people in countries like Rwanda, East Timor, [and] Indonesia how to grow wheat without water. To plant trees and grow vegetation in those war-torn zones. These are Muslim countries, and people that hate us. But we are doing lots of beautiful things for the world."

Wilson has also set his sights on increasing dollars raised for Israeli environmental science programs, so Israelis can continue to invent breakthrough technologies for the world's benefit.

"We know we should be the number 1 or number 2 fundraiser [for Israel] in Canada. Our goal is to reach the $20-million plateau," he said.

That number is more than double what the JNF raised in its best fundraising year, he said, adding that he believes this number is "very achievable."

Wilson has also initiated the organization's new "Ambassadors" program, for which 15 to 20 volunteers will be brought to Israel and trained to become representatives for JNF and Israel, to communicate the virtues of the Holy Land to organizations that don't normally hear about the JNF in Canada, such as church groups.

Those trainees will spend a week in Israel and return for further training with JNF's education shlichah to Canada, Wilson said.

"It's essentially a speakers' bureau. To really hone in on where we can make a difference," he said. "JNF are the caretakers of the Land of Israel on behalf of its owners, who are the Jewish people everywhere around the world."

Additionally, Wilson said he's hoping to create a new generation of young leaders in Canada for the JNF.

Without divulging specifics, Wilson said there will be "a huge thrust going forward" in the area of young leadership.

"We have to teach and talk to youth and explain to them tzedakah. Because the generations change," he said. "We need to educate the young professionals today, because they are going to be the donors of the future."

Though involved with JNF for more than 20 years in various capacities, Wilson said he had always considered becoming national president and felt that the time was right now to take the reins.

"These are difficult times, and we have to make changes. And we will," he said, adding that the JNF is an organization that needs "forward-looking planning, real direction and someone that's going to roll up their shirt sleeves and make things happen."

Outside his JNF role, he is also chair of the Reena Foundation and runs his own company, The Employment Solution, an employment staffing agency.

Wilson, who is unafraid to speak his mind, said that in his view, the Jewish community in Canada today is "a little convoluted. The fact is that we don't get our message out there very well. Israel has a public relations perception problem to begin with. [The JNF] being an Israeli-based organization… creates a situation where we have to go out and explain to people what we do. Our focus is Israel.

"[Federation] UJA, as we all know, is the United Way for the Jewish community. They do a marvellous job," he said. "But from my perspective, people really don't understand what JNF does for Israel and for the world."

Among other initiatives in the works, Wilson is organizing more golf tournaments for the JNF and said "more creative" approaches to fundraising for the organization will be revealed soon.

Born in Wales, Wilson was brought up Orthodox and almost pursued a career as a cantor.

His family immigrated to New York in 1947, and he subsequently moved to Canada in 1964, where he first became involved with JNF.

"My father was a Zionist who fought in the British army against the Germans. My parents always taught me when you have an opportunity and you're in a position to give back, you give back," Wilson said. "I love the organization and I've gotten to meet some wonderful people along the way. I'm very proud to be carrying the JNF banner across the country."

COOPER TO HEAD JNF TORONTO: Josh Cooper, founding executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC), a grassroots organization mandated to engage the Jewish community in the political process, will step down from his current position and become the Jewish National Fund's new Toronto executive director in September, JNF Canada announced late last week. Cooper will fill the void left by the late Ben Prossin, a JNF stalwart. Cooper has led CJPAC since its inception in May 2005. Details on who will replace Cooper at CJPAC were not immediately available.

Beth Tikvah appoints new assistant rabbi

Compiled by CJN Staff

Beth Tikvah Synagogue will soon be getting a new assistant rabbi.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover, a Montreal native and recent graduate of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, will join the congregation next month.

Rabbi Grover, 27, who earned a bachelor's degree in economics from Princeton University in 2004, will work with Beth Tikvah's youth director as a teacher and resource for the shul's youth and young families, as well as assisting Senior Rabbi Wayne Allen with teaching and pastoral care.

The addition of Rabbi Grover, says Rabbi Allen, gives Beth Tikvah the much-needed flexibility it needs to "increase exponentially our programming and services to our membership, on and off site."

"In a hospital setting, as a chaplain, I dealt not only with patients, but with their spouses, their children, their parents, so many of whom were in emotional, if not physical pain," he says. "Building relationships, not only with patients but with their entire families was the most challenging – and the valuable and rewarding – part of the experience."

Rabbi Grover says he'll draw on that experience for the pulpit, and he envisions his work at Beth Tikvah as a similar form of relationship- and community-building.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover

"What's great about a synagogue is working with people of all ages, but also bringing them together, whether it's in the services or on the steps outside. What I really hope is that my presence will make people feel welcome and that I can help build a stronger Conservative Jewish community — at Beth Tikvah and in Toronto."

He said he's looking forward to meeting with Beth Tikvah members, particularly young families, to understand their concerns and what they'd like to see in their synagogue. He envisions his first year on the job as a "sponge," soaking up knowledge about the community in order to help create the programs and services it needs.

"In many senses, my mission beyond the walls of the synagogue is the same as that within it: to think about ways to reinvigorate a congregation and a community that is rapidly aging, and to make it relevant to younger and future generations," he says.

"I'd like Beth Tikvah to be a destination synagogue: if you have a young Jewish family and you're searching for a welcoming spiritual home in Toronto, this should be where you want to belong."

Toronto said to be unaffected by Israeli conversion dispute

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Recent converts whose entry into the Jewish fold was officiated by the Toronto Orthodox rabbinate should have no concerns that their status as Jews could ever be challenged by an Israeli rabbinic court, stated the outgoing head of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, whose term as president of the Orthodox rabbinic council ends this week, said recent conversions in Toronto should be acceptable to the Israeli rabbinate, as converts were required to agree to the more rigorous standards set in Israel. Recent remarks in Israel by a haredi rabbi, who challenged conversions performed by a government-sanctioned Orthodox rabbinic body, should have no effect on Toronto conversions, Rabbi Tradburks said.

However, there's a much larger pool of converts whose status could be placed in question if they ever came before a theologically conservative haredi court in Israel, said Rabbi Martin Lockshin, former director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. "There were lenient Orthodox conversions in Toronto 40, 50, 60 years ago," he said. "In theory, if overturned, you could have three generations of people in Canada who could find that Israeli courts call their conversions null and void."

Rabbi Martin Lockshin

That's what happened to Yossi Fackenheim, son of renowned Jewish philosopher Emil Fackenheim, whose conversion as an infant was ruled invalid by an Israeli court because he was not living an observant lifestyle when he had his bar mitzvah.

More recently, the High Rabbinical Court of Israel's Chief Rabbinate ruled that the Jewish status of converts can be revoked at any time, regardless of which rabbinic court performed the conversion, unless the convert shows they have embraced an Orthodox lifestyle.

Rabbi Avraham Sherman, head of the High Rabbinical Court, who made that ruling, was also involved in a decision last year in which he stated all converts authorized by rabbinic courts under the supervision of Rabbi Chaim Druckman were invalid. Rabbi Druckman operates conversion courts established under the Chief Rabbinate that were tasked with converting tens of thousands of mostly Russian immigrants whose status as Jews was questionable.

Ironically, Rabbi Sherman's court also operates under the Chief Rabbinate and both are official arms of the Israeli government.

Earlier this month, Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger threw his support behind Rabbi Sherman, saying his decisions were consistent with the views of Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, a leading expert on Halachah.

That in turn prompted a condemnation from MK Uri Orbach of the Habayit Hayehudi (Jewish Home) party, who called for Rabbi Metzger's dismissal. "The honour of the converts supercedes that of the chief rabbi, who does not recognize the conversion of his own system," Orbach said, according to a report in Arutz Sheva.

At the same time, Tzohar, an association of modern Zionist rabbis in Israel, issued a statement saying, "It is inconceivable that the chief rabbi of Israel can... [express] complete distrust in the system of judges that he is meant to be heading. The chief rabbinate is positioned to offer a very positive contribution to our nation, but statements like these only serve to diminish the country's faith in this institution.

"We believe that the most important way to approach a potential convert is with love and patience," said Rabbi David Stav, co-founder of Tzohar.

Noting that as many as 200,000 immigrants may have been born Jewish but couldn't prove it, he said, "By dismissing these cases because of technicalities, the result is that these converts are forced to marry outside the context of Halachah, a situation which serves as an obstacle towards a central challenge facing the people of Israel – our continued existence as one nation."

Rabbi Lockshin called Rabbi Sherman's renunciation of the Israeli conversion court "a matter of grave concern. The main problem is that the decisions that have the blessing or the imprimatur of the state can be overturned by an individual rabbi later on.

"From a political point of view, it's crazy," he said. "It's no way to govern a country.

"The bigger issue is the human damage," he continued. "People go through the system, do all they were asked to do and find out later someone decides it's not valid. The hurt to people being treated this way, the human dimension," is troubling.

"Even Toronto conversions can come under question from the Israeli rabbinate," he added.

However, Rabbi Tradburks, who is moving to Israel later this summer, said Rabbi Metzger does not currently have jurisdiction over conversion issues. That is now in the hands of the Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar, who last year said he didn't believe Rabbi Sherman's decision was binding on other rabbinical courts.

"The whole thing is such a muddle," Rabbi Tradburks said. "There is no central authority that says all conversions are acceptable. That's the crux of the problem."

In traditional Jewish practice, authority over personal status issues was diffuse. Rabbis in different communities made their own rulings. That situation still pertains in Israel to some extent, so if a convert went to the rabbi in Netanya to be married, that rabbi could reject the application if he was not convinced the conversion was proper, Rabbi Tradburks said.

> 'There is no central authority that says all conversions are acceptable. That's the crux of the problem'

"There is a substantive rationale for checking every conversion," he continued. "There are a variety of standards" and there are rabbis who do not believe Rabbi Druckman's conversions are proper.

Stressing he was speaking only for himself, Rabbi Tradburks said "a central authority is especially appealing to me. Chaos in not appealing to me, whether about conversions or kashrut."

Rabbi Tradburks said if he lived in Israel, he'd be willing to give up control over conversions to the chief rabbinate.

"The only way to have clarity and consistency is to have a chief rabbinate issue a directive," he added.

However, Rabbi Lockshin said that "in the past, there was sufficient respect for rabbis that people did not call conversions of other rabbis into question."

Right now in Israel, a power struggle is underway between the haredi rabbis in control of the chief rabbinate and the rabbinical courts. "The haredim were never comfortable with the conversion courts," which were set up when Ariel Sharon was prime minister, he said.

The haredim are trying to impose their standards on other Orthodox rabbis, and because they are politically powerful, the secular parliamentary parties do not wish to intervene, Rabbi Lockshin added.

He speculated that the future might see "a parallel structure to the chief rabbinate.

"The question is, when will the modern Orthodox reach the breaking point and set up parallel institutions?" he asked.

Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit opens

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty was at the media preview event on June 24, during which photographers and videographers were given the only opportunity to photograph and film the exhibit.

"My hope is that all people, people of all ages, faiths and backgrounds, will come together to marvel at the scrolls and take this rare opportunity to discuss their meaning and significance," McGuinty said.

Dead Sea Scrolls guest curator Risa Levitt Kohn, an alumna of both York University and University of Toronto and director of the Jewish studies program at the San Diego State University, said that the show is about more than the scrolls themselves.

"This show is a show about the world from which they came, the culture that spawned the scrolls," she said, adding that the texts are a key to the ancient people at a critical juncture as the ancient Israelites transformed into the early Jews and early Christians.

Uzi Dahari, deputy director of the IAA, who was in Toronto last week for the opening of the exhibit, said that despite the painstaking efforts to safely transport the scrolls to Toronto and create ideal conditions to put them on display while preserving them, it's worth it to be able to share these artifacts with people around the world.

"We demand a lot of conditions. First of all, you can exhibit a scroll under certain conditions for three months and then it must rest for at least a year in a climate-controlled condition without any light," said Dahari, who has a PhD in archeology from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The Anne Tanenbaum Lecture Series, featuring some of the world's most renowned scholars on the Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, is meant to complement the six-month exhibit.

Each lecture will take place at the ROM, with the next lecture by Yuval Peleg, the district archeologist from Eastern Samaria and the Jordan Valley, scheduled to take place on July 2.

The lectures will run until December. For a listing or to register, visit www.rom.on.ca/scrolls and click on "events," or call 416-586-5797.

The ROM also partnered with the Koffler Centre of the Arts to display contemporary artwork by Joshua Neustein, who "explores themes and ideas suggested by the scrolls, shaping a dialogue with their historical and cultural traditions."

"I have seen a lot of exhibitions of the scrolls in many other venues around the world, believe me," Dahari said.

Despite the excitement surrounding the historic exhibit, the opening did not come and go without controversy.

On June 25, Palestine House, a non-profit educational and cultural centre in Mississuaga, Ont., issued a statement calling for a boycott of the exhibit.

The call came two months after Palestinian officials called on the Canadian government to cancel the show, because of claims that the scrolls were acquired illegally by Israel when the Jewish state annexed east Jerusalem in 1967.

The Palestine House statement said that it's calling for a boycott because the ROM is "displaying the artifacts looted by Israel from the Palestine Archaeological Museum. This is not the ethical or legal standard Canadians expect of the ROM."

It said it will boycott the exhibit unless the ROM admits the scrolls are Palestinian property.

In response to the claims from Palestinians that the artifacts are stolen property, Dahari said that at the moment, that debate is "irrelevant."

"Let's say the debate is that they say we are not the owners of the scrolls. OK, they can say that, but we are protecting the scrolls now. It is our responsibility. We are preserving the scrolls, we are investing a lot of money in doing it, we have the best lab to protect the scrolls… So we also exhibit them according to our responsibility of the curators at the moment," Dahari said.

"Even concerning the law, the only state that ever acted according to the Hague Convention [for the protection of cultural property] in 1954 was Israel, when it returned all the antiquities excavated by Israelis in the Sinai to Egypt after the peace agreement was signed between us," he added.

"To say that we are stealing their heritage, it's chutzpah. It is an insult. I don't understand. I am a historian, so I know that Islam is from the seventh century AD. The scrolls are from the second and third century BC and first century AD. This is not their heritage… This is Jewish heritage. It is written in Hebrew. It is our language, our Bible. What do they want from us?

"The Dead Sea Scrolls were written by Jews, were hidden in the desert by Jews… and they should remain in Israel."

Media denied access to the conference

In a June 18 address to York's senate, university president Mamdouh Shoukri said he understands that "the subject at the heart of the conference is one that many people find difficult, sensitive and very personal… All universities – not just York – must be dedicated to supporting reasoned discourse. They must be willing to accept dissent and deal with complex issues.

"These issues are discussed on a daily basis in all parts of the world, especially in the Middle East — including Israel. There is no reason why they should not be discussed at a university in Canada," Shoukri added.

Among the nearly 60 speakers, only a handful represented an Israeli narrative. Presenters included Omar Barghouti, a founding member of the Palestinian boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel, and Ali Abunimah, co-founder of the Electronic Intifada, a website that posts articles accusing Israel of ethnic cleansing and labelling it an apartheid state.

The media were denied access to the conference. Bruce Ryder, one of the organizers, said he believed a no-media policy would "help promote a scholarly atmosphere conducive to reflective, academic dialogue," but he added that the lectures were recorded and would be available later on the conference website at www.yorku.ca/ipconf.

Despite the news blackout, The CJN interviewed two Israeli presenters about their personal views on the conflict and their impressions of the conference.

Professor and human rights lawyer David Kretzmer of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem said that although he used to believe that a two-state solution was the preferred way out of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he has come to realize that it has become "more unlikely, unachievable and unviable."

Kretzmer, who considers himself to be on the "Israeli liberal Zionist left" of the political spectrum, said that while he was impressed by the calibre of speakers at the event, he was discouraged by the rhetoric from the floor.

"I think there is a disparity between the speakers, who are of a very high quality and of a high academic standard, and the audience, some of whom have been very, very emotional, and I would say that generally, the rhetoric from the floor has been very, very critical of Israel, to say the least, and certainly unaccepting of any legitimate Israeli narrative," he said.

Kretzmer said that one of the lectures that affected him most was the address by University of Pennsylvania professor Ian Lustick, whose lecture, titled "Thinking the Unthinkable: Perhaps There is No Solution," forced him to consider his greatest fear.

"But it's a luxury for people from the outside to say that there is no solution… But those of us who live there are living the conflict itself, and we have to try to find ways out of the political impasse, and that is what we are doing," Kretzmer said.

He said he felt that the fears of Toronto's Jewish community were misconceived.

"I don't see why Israeli Jews can ask these questions, but Canadian Jews suddenly feel that if you ask the questions and try to address them, suddenly, you are delegitimizing the state of Israel."

Meron Benevisti, a former deputy mayor of Jerusalem and a self-proclaimed "radical leftist Israeli," said debates about Israel's future are masking the fact that "a durable bi-national state already exists in Israel and the West Bank for at least 20 years."

He said that his impressions of the conference is that it was a gathering of left-of-centre academics who are preaching to the converted.

Benevisti added that the demonstrations by the Jewish community are "ludicrous."

"To think about me coming to see my own national flag in a demonstration against myself – I, who was born and raised in Israel and has grandchildren in Israel – I have to feel that I'm a traitor?"

On the other hand, he said he understands the concerns the Jewish community has when it comes to scholars who push the idea that there should not be a Jewish state.

"There are some scholars and some speakers here who use the one-state solution as a disguise to delegitimize the Jewish collective in Israel… But there are others who believe that dialogue is necessary because… the present situation is unbearable," Benevisti said

"It is a complex issue, but complex issues should be debated with open minds and not with demonstrations."

Canadian group supporting medical research at Hebrew U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) hopes that the $50 million it is raising for the school's medical research community will help advance discoveries, scientific breakthroughs and cures that will change the world.

In May 2008, CFHU, a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem with chapters from coast to coast, pledged to raise $50 million over eight years to support the new Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC).

Jon Allen

The institute, housed in a brand new building on the Ein Kerem medical campus, is meant to encourage interdisciplinary partnerships to help scientists better understand how to prevent and combat diseases such as cancer, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease.

As the name of the institute suggests, Israel's most brilliant scientific minds will work and partner with some of Canada's best and brightest.

For example, the University of Alberta's Dr. James Shapiro has partnered with Hebrew U's Dr. Yuval Dor in the hope that their collaboration could lead to a breakthrough in treating diabetics by discovering how to trigger the regeneration of insulin-producing cells.

In Montreal, McGill University's Dr. Moshe Szyf, who holds a PhD from Hebrew U, will partner with IMRIC researchers including his mentor, Prof. Howard Cedar, head of the Hebrew U developmental biology and cancer research department. Cedar's research is fundamental to understanding the genetic defects that lead to cancer through DNA methylation (chemical changes in the DNA molecule).

Last month, The CJN and five other journalists from Quebec and Manitoba were invited to Israel to tour the university and IMRIC, and to meet with some of Israel's brightest scientific minds.

On the six-day tour, in addition to meeting with researchers and scientists who shared information about their discoveries, the journalists visited Hebrew U's Stephen Spielberg Jewish Film Archives and the Albert Einstein Archives; toured Israel's Holocaust Museum, Yad Vashem, and the Old City of Jerusalem; visited the home of the Canadian Ambassador to Israel Jon Allen; and ended the trip with time to explore Israel's bustling metropolis of Tel Aviv.

CFHU's national president Nathan Lindenberg said that raising $50 million is the "most significant undertaking" in CFHU's history, and he is proud that his organization is working to support the institute.

"It's a very unique program. They are integrating research and the clinical aspects of medicine, and they've restructured the whole medical educational and service system," Lindenberg said.

In an effort to be more efficient and to encourage more collaboration between scientists, the number of departments at IMRIC were reduced from 14 to five, and 11 new "research hubs" are being established.

Lindenberg said that Hebrew U – founded by scholars and visionaries including Albert Einstein, Sigmund Freud, Martin Buber and Chaim Weizmann, 23 years before the State of Israel was established – produces a "disproportionate" number of Nobel Prize winners.

"We want to continue that. We hope there will be more Nobel Prize winners," he said.

On June 10, during the IMRIC dedication on the Ein Kerem campus, steps away from the Octav and Marcela Botnar Research Building where IMRIC is based, the institute's chair David Lichtstein said the new building increased lab space by about 30 per cent.

David Lichtstein

"This means we can be more attractive in recruiting exceptional scientists and that the laboratories may be more spacious," Lichtstein said.

He added that the idea behind IMRIC is to bring scientists physically closer together, making it easier to collaborate within different disciplines on a particular medical problem.

"This will promote strong interdisciplinary research programs and significantly improve the quality of our research, our efficiency and productivity," Lichtstein said.

Outgoing CFHU national president Ronnie Appleby, who was one of the major players in initiating the fundraising project for IMRIC, said this is a contribution that will affect people all over the world.

"This partnership, this joining together of Canada and Israel for the benefit of Israel, the Jewish People and all mankind, is most worthwhile."

Ambassador Allen said CFHU's relationship with IMRIC is characteristic of the 60-year diplomatic bond between Canada and Israel.

"In part due to the unwavering and strong support of my Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and in part due to the kinds of relationships that people like Ronnie Appleby and Nathan Lindenberg are building together, the relationship is at a new high. I feel that this opening of IMRIC… is an essential part of the 60th celebration [of Canada-Israel diplomatic relations]," Allen said.

"My wish is that in 10 years… The groundbreaking and award-winning research will be fully funded with the generous assistance of Canadians and we will all be here dedicating Phase II of the project."

The Child's Voice Foundation and its Angel Hair for Kids program provide wigs free of charge to financially disadvantaged children who have lost their hair due to illness. The haircuts took place on June 22 at the Marc Anthony Hair Salon on Avenue Road in Toronto, which donated its services for the event. In the picture, Emma Albaum holds her freshly shorn 12.5-inch ponytail. Her brother, Eli, is in the background. It takes 10 to 12 ponytails, each a minimum of nine inches long, and costs $800 to make one wig.

'How did the Qumran community understand the Torah?'
Cave Four at Qumran has yielded a number of fragments that paraphrase the Torah rather that quoting from it precisely. Most scholars have argued that this did not suggest that the authors had a different version of the Torah but included their commentary within the citation. Rabbi Allen will show several examples of this phenomenon and look at how the Qumran passages illuminate the laws of kashrut, personal injury, and the ceremony of first fruits.

All three events are open to the community. No charge.

Toronto chef cooks up new role for TV

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Chef Ezra Title hadn't planned on becoming a TV celebrity. But with the première of his new show The Healthy Gourmet, on July 4 at 7:30 p.m. on the new VIVA network, he'll do just that.

A Jewish Toronto native – Title attended Leo Baeck Day School and then went to Forest Hill Collegiate Institute – he has spent the last decade creating and serving scrumptious fare to clients, using techniques learned at the sides of master chefs across North America.

Though he favours French and Italian cooking, like any good chef worth his salt, so to speak, Title is adept at all forms of gastronomy.

Good thing, too. Because he's being put to the test this year as the chef in The Healthy Gourmet, alongside his co-host, Toronto nutritionist Julie Daniluk.

The show's premise pits Title against Daniluk on a episodic basis, as they try to teach select women's groups – from women's hockey teams to a group of women anglers – how to make their meals more delicious (Title's job), while simultaneously increasing their nutritive value.

Speaking to Heebonics during a break in filming on a recent shoot in Toronto, Title said he thought it would be challenging to jump into the world of TV while still employing his culinary skills.

"I like to be involved in a range of things," he said. "This was something new to add to my repertoire. I'm completely out of my element. Cooking on camera is different than cooking for real."

Be that as it may, Title said he's having a blast filming this new show with the cast and crew, and learning all the ways not to act on camera.

"I have something the director calls 'Ezra speak'... so I'm learning how to talk to the camera and position myself," he said. "My biggest challenge on screen is learning to be articulate and eloquent [while] being direct, without stuttering and pausing."

Though the show is unscripted, Title said he's happy without the safety net of written dialogue, preferring to banter with Daniluk and guests in his natural, gregarious style.

Watching him film some short sequences, it becomes obvious that when talking about food preparation and selection, Title has a wealth of knowledge and an inherent ability to communicate the joy of cooking to onlookers.

"I can talk about cooking 24/7. It's what I love," he said.

It was there, he said, that he realized he missed his mother's Jewish home cooking. "I was used to good food," he said, smiling, so he began reading up on preparing his own meals.

He discovered he liked the "instant gratification" of creating something edible with his own hands.

Title warns aspiring cooks who think they can go from cooking a meal in their dorm to being a full-time, professional chef to think again.

"I recommend getting experience... [which] comes from working in a restaurant," he said.

Title said he got his start by cold-calling at restaurants and volunteering to work in order to gain experience in the sector.

After obtaining his associates degree in the culinary arts from the California Culinary Academy, Title trained with some of the best chefs in the world at well-known restaurants such as New York's Restaurant Daniel and Blue Hill at Stone Barns, and Jardiniere in San Francisco.

He returned to Toronto in 2005 and began his own business, Chez Vous Dining, after obtaining a master of business administration in hospitality tourism management from Guelph University.

Though he works anywhere from 10 to 18 hours a day and is "hands-on" in his business, Title said one of his greatest joys is visiting the various local farmer's markets around Toronto, where he sources produce for his business.

"I look forward to spring every year. I get excited by seeing all the [Ontario] produce again," he said.

Title also rents spots at two farmer's markets in Toronto – the Don Valley Brick Works market and the Artscape Wychwood Barns market, where he makes breakfasts for shoppers and fellow vendors.

Growing up kosher, Title has also incorporated his love for Jewish soul food with his own unique twists to some standard Ashkenazi fare, such as rosemary-tinged matzah balls and kugel with caramelized onions.

He still has Shabbat dinners every Friday. He and his wife, Elisse Peltz, recently welcomed their first child into the world.

"My wife is my closest closest confidante," Title said, adding that she keeps him honest in his professional life. "She has an amazing palate. I run everything by her."

Title said for him, food isn't just a job, "it's a lifestyle. It's a part of my family's life. I have an edible garden which I use at home."

In addition to working on The Healthy Gourmet and running his catering business, Title recently partnered with his wife on an initiative called Yo Dinna, which offers clients an evening of sampling his gourmet creations, coupled with a yoga course given by Peltz, a yoga instructor.

"In my professional life, I don't consider nutrition so much when I cook," he said," he said. "For events [cooking], food has to taste as good as it can. But in my personal life, I try to eat as nutritious as I can. I take a lot of what Julie says and incorporate it in my diet."

For more information about The Healthy Gourmet, visit www.myviva.ca/groups.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Jewish cooking, the original fusion food

By DENISE PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Food and family have always been important to the Jewish People. Although some may say that what we eat speaks to who we are, there is no really clear definition of Jewish cuisine. It varies enormously from country to country and within different communities, and it's a function of Jewish dietary laws, Jewish Sabbath laws, holiday rituals and the local food and cooking customs of the many lands in which Jews have lived over the centuries.

It could be said that Jewish Cookery is the world's first example of fusion cooking:

The importance of religion in our food cannot be underestimated. For example, on Shabbat, because we are not permitted to cook or light a fire, Jews have developed the talent of using one pot to combine the best ingredients the household can buy, cooked on a very low heat before sundown and eaten for lunch on Shabbat. Stews such as cholent, hameem and adafina have become classic recipes.

In Russia, the dish is served with kasha, buckwheat toasted with onions and mushrooms. In Czechoslovakia it is served with kugel, and the Poles tend to make it with potato dumplings. The Sephardi communities call their version adafina, which means "buried," referring to the cooking pot that was buried in the fireplace ashes and to the eggs cooked in their shells that were buried in the stew.

Shabbat would not be the same without challah, the ultimate in Jewish bread. Traditionally, kosher challah is made pareve, and the two loaves used on Friday night signify the double portion of manna that was provided for the Israelites in the desert before Shabbat, following the Exodus from Egypt.

Like Shabbat, Jewish holidays provide an opportunity for speciality dishes connected to our history and traditions. On Shavuot, it is customary to have dairy foods, and for many, it is viewed as the "cheesecake festival." One of the reasons given for use of dairy products is that the Israelites in the wilderness were not familiar with the laws of kashrut and it was simpler to keep to non-meat ingredients.

Ethnic background also played an important part in the way Jewish cuisine developed. Jews have travelled to nearly every corner of the globe, and life in the Diaspora has contributed to many of the differences that exist within our religion and its cuisine.

Ashkenazi Jews originate from Russia and eastern European countries like Poland, and their cuisine is heavily influenced by the cold climate. Vegetables were pickled in salt rather than fermented with spices. Examples include pickled brisket, red cabbage, cucumbers and beetroot. Freshwater fish like carp and herring were smoked and salted. Sugar, honey, raisins and lemon juice were commonly used to preserve food. Sweet and sour recipes were popular. Potatoes in the form of kugels, latkes and dumplings helped the poor community make a little go a long way!

By contrast, Sephardi cuisine was developed by Jews living in hot climates. It blends their heritage and dietary laws with a distinct influence from the Iberian and Arabic culture and traditions. Its cuisine is fragrant with spices including cinnamon, turmeric and cumin, and herbs like coriander, dill and mint. Olive oil is a staple. The onions, potatoes and chicken fat that were basic ingredients for Ashkenazim are virtually unknown!

Differences are also evident when it comes to Passover. Sephardi Jews have the custom of eating rice, legumes, corn and beans – all foods that are forbidden for Ashkenazi Jews at that time.

Symbolism is yet another element that influences our Jewish cuisine, and Passover is the best-known example. Matzah, the unleavened bread eaten on Pesach, is symbolic of the time when the Jews left Egypt in such haste that they did not have time to let their bread rise.

But we have now added a more modern touch – coconut pyramids, matzah balls and macaroons have become classics during this eight-day festival because they use permitted ingredients.

On Sukkot, the harvest festival, we eat in a sukkah and our recipes include lots of fruits and vegetables, often stuffed to symbolize the wish for a bountiful harvest.

Another symbolic Jewish classic are hamantashen we eat on Purim, when the three-cornered pastries represent Haman's ears.

So the vast array of recipes that we now enjoy are the result of our having vacuumed up the flavours, ingredients and recipes from the countries that our ancestors have travelled through or lived in and then adapted in order to adhere to the laws of kashrut.

Just as the Jewish people are a melange of nationalities and backgrounds, our food, too, has a complicated DNA made up of various strands, all of which create the exciting and varied range of menus that we choose from today.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though neither of her parents hailed from Lodz, Rochelle Michaels felt an almost irresistible desire to visit the Polish city during a Jewish heritage and memorial program five years ago.

A member of the Lodzer Centre Congregation, Michaels was in the sanctuary when the event was announced from the bimah, and she witnessed first hand the immediate and visceral reaction of congregants.

People stood up and proclaimed they would never go to a memorial in Poland, she recalled.

"They were angry and very upset, and they spoke about personal experiences in Poland and said they would never go back."

At the same time, they were torn by the desire to return to the land of their birth to visit for the last time the cemeteries where family members were buried, she added.

Intrigued by the reaction and the program being assembled by the Polish government, Michaels decided to make the trip along with her then 14-year-old son, Sam.

"I felt it was important to go and bear witness," she said. "After a time at the Lodzer [Synagogue], I felt I wanted to go to Poland to take a part of their hearts with me, to honour the survivors and to recognize the victims."

Michaels said the program was incredibly emotional, and it was made all the more so by the efforts of the current generation of Poles to honour and recognize the Jews of their community who were killed in the Holocaust.

A program to commemorate the 65th anniversary of the liquidation of Lodz's Litzmanstadt Ghetto – the "Jewish Memorial and Heritage Program" in short – is planned for Aug. 24 to 31.

So far, interest from the Jewish community has been "surprisingly very modest," said Andrew Pirowski, project manager for Panorama Travel, the official tour operator for the event.

Not only are Canadians reluctant to make the trip, so, too, are Americans.

"We have found people from the Toronto area. We have a group, but nothing compared to the numbers five years ago," he said.

"We had expected more, and the city had expected it would generate more interest. We understand the survivors are aging, but they have family and we expected they would continue their ties to their grandparents' roots."

The Polish government has set up a website to publicize the event (http://www.ghetto.lodz.pl/) and in it, Lodz mayor Jerzy Kropiwnicki noted that the commemoration will honour the city's Jews as well as the Poles who risked their lives to save them.

"This monument will become an evident symbol of humanity in the hell of German occupation, both for the Jews and the Poles," Kropiwnicki stated.

"There is no way to comprehend the crime that was committed here. We can only remember it. For a decent man, there is no choice but to side with a victim. For a decent city like Lodz, there is no choice either. And any previous neighbour relations – good or bad – are irrelevant. There is a crime, a perpetrator, a victim and a witness. I could not see any other role for my city but to stand up for the victim and to testify."

Michaels is planning to revisit Lodz this summer, and this time she's taking her younger son, Ezra.

Ezra, 14, consulted with his older brother, who has taken a variety of trips abroad and said his most memorable one was to Poland, followed by a visit to Israel.

"Ezra wanted to have that experience too," she said.

For the children of survivors – Michaels' father, Henry Kay, was from Kielce – such a trip holds "many memorable moments," she said.

Ex-Liberal candidate sues CJC, B'nai Brith

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies correspondent

WINNIPEG — Former federal Liberal candidate Lesley Hughes is suing Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada, charging they ruined her political career by saying that she's anti-Semitic.

During last fall's election campaign, Hughes generated national headlines when it was revealed she wrote an article for a community newspaper in 2002 alleging that Israeli, American, German and Russian intelligence agencies all had advance warning of the Al Qaeda attack on the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001. She further claimed Israeli businesses were forewarned and vacated the building a week before the attack. The article was also posted on her website.

Lesley Hughes

As a result of the revelation, the former CBC radio broadcaster – she co-hosted the CBC Winnipeg morning show for a number of years – was forced to step down as the Liberal candidate for Kildonan-St. Paul and finished her run as an independent in the October election, finishing a distant third.

Now Hughes has filed a lawsuit against Conservative MP Peter Kent, B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant and former Congress co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol, as well as Bernie Farber, Congress' CEO.

Hughes filed the suit June 16 in Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench. She alleges that the defendants "made untrue and defamatory accusations" that she is anti-Semitic. She charges that senior members of B'nai Brith and CJC went to see then-Liberal leader Stéphane Dion on Sept. 25, 2008, with her 2002 article and persuaded Dion to drop her as a candidate on the grounds that she was anti-Semitic and "unfit to hold public office."

She said that Kent, now the minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas) and the MP for the heavily Jewish Toronto-area riding of Thornhill, charged in a Sept. 26 news release that Hughes believed "extreme anti-Israel /9-11 conspiracy theories" and was "unfit to serve in public office."

Hughes states that as a result of being branded an anti-Semite, she has been unable to find work as a freelance journalist and broadcaster. Although she acknowledges authorship of the article in question, she says that all the accusations against her were untrue.

B'nai Brith legal counsel Anita Bromberg said her organization hasn't received any papers pertaining to the lawsuit yet and, therefore, has no comment.

"We have to wait and see what the nature of her complaint is before we can respond to it in any comprehensive way," Bromberg said.

Farber had a similar response, referring readers to a column he wrote about Hughes and her theories on Oct. 3, 2008, in the National Post.

"Let's be clear," he wrote. "CJC has never accused Ms. Hughes of being an anti-Semite. Nor is she the object of a witch hunt or the victim of thought police. She was damned by her own hand because of her unapologetic association with 9/11 Jewish conspiracy theories. If Ms. Hughes was, as she has suggested, simply 'reporting' alternate theories to the generally 'accepted' version of the events of Sept. 11, she would have done well to clarify that those theories were anti-Semitic in nature because they represented a collective assault on the Jewish people and the essence of the community's nature.

"The reality is that people sometimes make unfortunate choices to support unsubstantiated theories. When these allegations create harm like this one does, though, those people must be held accountable. In a press conference held on Oct. 2, Ms. Hughes maintained her stubborn and seemingly purposeful wilful blindness on her wrong-headed embrace of this terrible slander. No one who subscribes to these hateful fantasies, and then refuses to recant when challenged, is fit to serve in the national legislature of a proudly pluralistic nation that counts respect for diversity among its core values."

Neither Hughes nor her lawyer, Norman Cuddy, were available for comment last week.

Quebec court defers judgment on lawsuit against Canadian firms

Compiled by CJN Staff

A Quebec judge is not expected to decide until September whether a lawsuit by a Palestinian West Bank village against two Montreal-based companies can be heard here.

Quebec Superior Court Justice Louis-Paul Cullen heard arguments from both sides over three days last week.

Ronald Levy, the lawyer for Green Mount International Inc. and Green Park International Inc., presented a motion to have the case dismissed. The municipal council of Bil'in is seeking to have the court declare that the companies' construction of housing for Jewish settlers on land the village lost with the erection of Israel's security barrier is illegal. It also wants the 16 apartments it has built demolished and $2 million in punitive damages.

Bil'in's lead lawyer Mark Arnold argued that the companies are committing a war crime, violating both international law and Canada's own 2000 Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act, which prohibits an occupying power from transferring its civilian population into territory acquired as a result of war.

Levy's main arguments are that Israeli courts have already determined that the individual plaintiff, the late Ahmed Issa Abdallah Yassin, wasn't the legal owner of the land on which the companies built. He also maintains that this case isn't within the jurisidiction of a Canadian court, and the fact the companies are registered in Quebec is irrelevant.

MINISTERIAL MEETING: Canadian Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon, left, and his Israeli counterpart, Avigdor Lieberman, met in Ottawa last week, part of Lieberman's trip to North America that included talks with Obama administration officials in Washington. Lieberman and Cannon held discussions on "a range of bilateral issues that support the continuing partnership between Canada and Israel, and matters of mutual concern in the Middle East," the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade said in a statement. Cannon described the visit as "an opportunity to underscore the close friendship of Canada and Israel, which this year mark 60 years of diplomatic relations." Lieberman said Israel "very much appreciates" Canada's position on Israel and the situation in the Middle East in general.

One special recollection from the 2004 visit was a children's concert remembering the Jewish children who did not survive. The event attracted so many Poles that the venue quickly filled up and those who could not get inside stood outside in silence.

"When we came out they left a row for us to exit and faced us as though they wanted to share with us in that experience," Michaels said.

On the final day, the program was scheduled for the train station "to remember the last transport. People filled the street to honour those who survived," she said.

Many Lodzer congregation members remain bitter over their treatment at the hands of their former neighbours, But Michael believes "the country is changing, and [that] needs to be recognized."

Voyage of the St. Louis remembered in Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Lisa Avedon was only four years old in 1939, but she has vivid memories of her first reception in North America as a passenger on the S.S. St. Louis.

"There are a few pieces I remember today," the Toronto woman, 74, said, speaking June 17 at a ceremony in Halifax commemorating the fateful voyage of the ship. More than 200 people crowded the Maritime Museum of the Atlantic for an event co-ordinated by the museum and the Atlantic Jewish Council.

"I know I was seasick most of the trip and saw only my stateroom and a bit of the deck," Avedon said. "But I'll never forget sitting in Havana Harbour, where we were refused admittance at the last minute after being granted visas weeks before."

Avedon said her uncle, living in New Jersey at the time, came to meet her and her family and was sitting in a boat beside the ship that held 907 German Jews fleeing Nazi persecution. "I called to him, 'Take me with you' and I was ready to jump off the deck."

Soon, she was on her way back to Europe, as the Jews were also refused entry into the United States and Canada. The St. Louis' captain docked in Antwerp, Belgium, and the passengers found refuge outside Germany. When the Nazi machine moved into those countries months later, 255 were swept up and exterminated in the concentration camps.

"The fact that this [memorial event] is considered important in Halifax is important to me. It's vital that we're not forgotten," Avedon said. "When I think of the trouble many refugees have today [gaining entry to Canada], the story of the St. Louis has to be carried on. What's going on elsewhere is no different from my story."

With fire in her 74-year-old eyes, she added, "What is the United Nations doing? Are they helping anyone? There is no reason for humans to treat others this way. Considering the resources we have today, are we doing anything differently? People should be pressing their leaders to show compassion."

Museum historian Dan Conlin reviewed the story of the St. Louis. He told how Canada's prime minister at the time, Mackenzie King, was ready to admit the Jewish immigrants until his immigration chief, F.C. Blair, known for his hatred of Jews, sent King a secret memo explaining that the passengers didn't qualify under immigration laws.

The oft-quoted phrase, "None is too many" has been attributed to Blair.

Each name of the 255 who died in the camps was recited. A replica of the ship, built over 250 hours by museum volunteer Tom Power, and other artifacts, were on display and will be in a permanent exhibit starting in October.

Jewish vets hear from D-Day officer

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — As the years pass and World War II becomes for many just a story in the history books, there are fewer and fewer people with first-hand memories of the era and even fewer people with whom to share them.

A recent event at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) brought together members of the Jewish War Veterans Ottawa Post and their guests from Branch 638 of the Royal Canadian Legion, as well as members of the group Active Jewish Adults 50+ to hear the stories and reminiscences of a local war hero, Edmond Hutchison.

Post Cmdr. Phil Pinkus introduced Hutchison, whom he has spoken to at length about his war experiences.

"I know you will also be given an absorbing presentation focusing on an historical moment in time on the road to defeating the tyranny then enslaving Europe as well as to remove forever the threat to our way of life," Pinkus said.

Lt.-Col. Edmond Hutchison enlisted in the Canadian Active Service Force on Sept. 5, 1939, as company sergeant major. He and his two brothers were among the volunteers who signed up when war broke out. A year and a half later, after being commissioned as an officer, Hutchison was posted overseas with the Perth Regiment as an intelligence officer.

As he greeted his fellow veterans, Hutchison acknowledged their dwindling numbers. "We are a diminishing breed, so when there are so many of us together it is brilliant news," he said.

"It has been 64 years since the end of the war, so some of my memories may not be the same as yours," Hutchison said as he began his talk, titled "Selected Memories of World War II."

Audience member Jerry Penso is a regular in the SJCC gym and has known and chatted with fellow member, "Ed" for years. "I had no idea that Ed was a war hero," said Penso who attended the event to hear his friend's story.

Hutchison has been a member of the SJCC for nearly a decade and is well known there to regulars. In fact, it was fellow member and vet Albert Winer who suggested that Hutchison share his stories with the Ottawa Post.

In 1943, Hutchison was selected to return to Canada to attend the Canadian War Staff College at the Royal Military College in Kingston. Assignment completed, he returned overseas to the Headquarters 2 of the Canadian Corps, remaining there as an operations staff officer for the duration of the war.

The audience listened with rapt attention to Hutchison's detailed reminiscences of his war experiences, including the intricacies of the D-Day operation.

"Everything military had a code word, and Operation Overlord was called D-Day, a title given to it by Churchill, the greatest amphibian attack in history," said Hutchison. "Had the D-Day landing failed, the outcome of the war would have been very different. There was no margin for error and the penalty for failure would have been inestimable," he said.

Montrealer makes bid for Agriprocessors

Compiled by CJN Staff

Montreal businessman Hershey Friedman is expected to buy the bankrupt Iowa-based kosher slaughterhouse Agriprocessors Inc., according to information filed in a U.S. court last week.

Friedman, who owns a plastics company in Montreal, has formed a new company called SHF Industries LLC, registered in Iowa, which has agreed to pay part of the $21 million (US) that Agriprocessors owes to its largest creditors.

The company's bankruptcy trustee, Joseph Sarachek, has asked the court to allow the sale in order to save the plant from closing.

Agriprocessors, located in Postville, Iowa, has been owned by the Brooklyn-based Rubashkin family. It went bankrupt last fall after running afoul of U.S immigration authorities for employing illegal immigrants.

Friedman is the president of Polystar Packaging.

The Des Moines Register reported that Friedman and his two partners have agreed to pay at least $8.5 million of Agriprocessors' debt and to accept the plant on an "as is, where is" basis.

In May 2008, immigration officials raided Agriprocessors, arresting 389 workers, mainly from Mexico and Guatemala.

The plant was the largest kosher meat supplier in the United States before the raid. It filed for bankruptcy last November. Former company vice-president Sholom Rubashkin and three former managers also face federal charges related to hiring and harbouring illegal immigrants, as well as bank fraud, money laundering and non-payment for livestock.

Whether Friedman, who is known to be an observant Jew, intends to keep the plant kosher is not clear. It's currently under the supervision of the Orthodox Union.

The sale to the group headed by Friedman still needs the approval of a bankruptcy court.

There have been reports on the Internet that Hershey Friedman is the brother of Moshe Friedman, owner of the Montreal-based kosher Marvid Poultry Canada Inc.

But Moshe Friedman told The CJN that he's not related to Hershey Friedman and is not involved in his offer to buy the company.

In January, Soglowek Nahariya, a large Israeli meat processor, offered $40 million for Agriprocessors, but it withdrew its bid because it said couldn't fully investigate the company, the Cedar Rapids Gazette reported.

'I'm happy for the opportunity to celebrate'

In addition to attending Assaf's graduation ceremony on their week-long visit, MacLean and his family also attended the bat mitzvah of Ilan and Rona Ramon's youngest daughter, Noa.

"I'm happy for the opportunity to celebrate some happy occasions with the Ramons," MacLean said.

The Ramons and the MacLeans became close friends after Ilan and Steve met and trained together with NASA at the Johnson Space Center in Houston in the late '90s. After the Columbia disaster, MacLean became the casualty assistance and calls officer for Ilan Ramon, supporting his family and offering them the solace that only an experienced astronaut would be able to provide. "Our families are quite integrated," MacLean said.

Before the tragedy that ended Ramon's life, the MacLean and Ramon families had planned to tour the Nahalal Valley in Israel together in the summer of 2003, after their respective missions in space, Ramon's on the Columbia, and MacLean's scheduled to take place 12 weeks after that.

"Our families ended up together in the Nahalal Valley that summer, but not as we had intended. It was very sad."

In 2006 prior to his second visit to Israel, MacLean took a small Torah scroll belonging to Holocaust survivor Henry Fenichel of Cincinnati, Ohio, into space aboard the Atlantis shuttle as a tribute to Ramon, who had brought a scroll from Bergen-Belsen aboard the Columbia in honour of the survivors of Auschwitz in his own family.

"To do that for my friend was quite an amazing bonding experience," MacLean said.

After the Columbia break-up, MacLean dedicated his efforts at NASA to increasing the safety of crews and security of space vehicles as technical lead for the Canadian-built orbiter boom sensor system, which has a camera and laser that enable astronauts to check the bottom of the orbiter for possible damage, and as member of the NASA board responsible for ensuring the integrity of the shuttle's thermal protection system prior to re-entry into the atmosphere.

Although his current trip has focused on the personal, MacLean has also met with the Israel Space Agency (ISA), Canadian Ambassador to Israel Jon Allen and senior trade commissioner Catherine Gosselin to discuss the potential for including Israel in various co-operative initiatives with the Canadian Space Agency (CSA).

The ISA and the CSA signed a memorandum of understanding in 2004 that established the Canada-Israel Research Development Fund (CIRDF) and laid the groundwork for space research co-operation between the two countries. Because of the high costs and mutual interest in data from space, MacLean said most space research is done co-operatively, involving the input of several countries.

"The co-operative model we have with Israel is the most effective model for multinational space research projects," he said. Rather than work together on each element of a given project, Israel handles one part, and Canada a different part. Because no money is pooled or crosses borders, both agencies avoid a lot of bureaucracy that they would otherwise encounter.

"Israel is a great country to work with. We employ a very effective way of doing business with Israel that is incredibly efficient and smart and has governments leveraging money rather than using it."

Canada and Israel are considering several joint projects: developing micro- and mini-satellites and related technologies; creating instruments for earth observation and sharing observational data; working on hyper-spectral satellites; creating scientific education programs for youth, as well as graduate-level university exchanges.

"That Canadians get international experience is extremely important," MacLean said.

In addition, he said, there is a possibility for working together on optics, since Canada is a leader in this field and Israel is interested in expanding its optical capabilities. Also, Israel has a small launcher that Canada may want to use to launch a new satellite into space.

He said, however, that the highlight of the trip has been meeting with Ramon's family and friends. "The highlight for me has been visiting with these people, whom I have now known for some seven years," MacLean said. "It is quite amazing when you have someone with the character of Ilan and you see his friends and family… We share something very special."

This trip also marked the first time MacLean has taken a tour of the country. "It has been great to see so much more of Israel this time," he said, recalling the photo he took from space of Israel, the photo he shared with Ilan at one of their first meetings. "When you look at Israel from space it's so beautiful. And it's beautiful from the ground, too."

No truth to Schalit release reports, Barak says

JTA

JERUSALEM — There is no truth to recent reports that a deal over kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit is imminent, Ehud Barak said.

"The reports on the release of Schalit are incorrect and even damaging," the Israeli defence minister said during Sunday's cabinet meeting.

European diplomats and Arab officials have been saying since last week that Schalit was set to be moved to Egypt as part of a prisoner swap with Hamas that would also involve the lifting of the Gaza blockade.

Also Sunday, the Hamas official in charge of negotiations over Schalit said the recent reports had no basis in fact.

Schalit was captured by Hamas in a cross-border raid on June 25, 2006.

Jackson children's Jewish mother could regain custody

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Reports are conflicting over whether the Jewish mother of two of the late Michael Jackson's children will seek custody.

Jackson, the "King of Pop" who died last Thursday of unspecified causes, and Debbie Rowe are the parents of Prince Michael I, 12, and Paris Michael Katherine, 11. By virtue of having a Jewish mother, they are considered Jewish.

According to London's Sunday Times, sources close to Rowe said she won't fight Katherine Jackson, the pop star's mother, for custody of the children, and that she would be satisfied with more access to them.

But Iris Finsilver, Rowe's attorney, told the Associated Press that she was certain that Rowe would seek custody of the two children. Finsilver had previously confirmed that Rowe was Jewish.

Jackson married Rowe, his former nurse, in 1996, when she was six months pregnant, following his divorce from Lisa Marie Presley, the daughter of the famed late singer Elvis Presley.

Rowe signed a contract waiving her parental rights after she and Jackson divorced in 1999. She later contested the contract, among other arguments expressing her fears that the children were exposed to the teachings of the Nation of Islam through their nanny and some of Jackson's siblings.

An appeals court ruled in her favour in 2006, but ultimately the custody battle was settled out of court.

Legal authorities contacted by the Los Angeles Times agreed in general that under California law, Rowe would be likely to regain custody, even if Jackson had designated another guardian in his will.

Jackson had a third child, Prince Michael II, with a surrogate mother whose identity has not been revealed.

Israel could benefit from Iranian unrest

By LESLIE SUSSER

Like the collapse of the Soviet Union nearly two decades ago, the outcome of the post-election unrest in Iran could be of major strategic significance for the Middle East and for Israel.

Israeli analysts see three possible scenarios:

- President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the ruling ayatollahs use more force to reassert the authority of their regime.
- Ahmadinejad's presidential rival, Mir Hossein Mousavi, sweeps to power on a wave of popular support and reforms what still remains an essentially clerical regime.
- The unrest takes on a dynamic of its own, driving the ayatollahs from power.

In each scenario, Israel stands to benefit.

Clearly, regime change in Tehran could alter radically the political landscape of the entire region.

After the fall of the Soviet Union, the Middle East gradually adopted a new but equally bipolar character: instead of the Soviet Union and its proxies standing against the United States and its allies, Iran has supplanted the Soviet role as the prime adversary. It was Iran that fuelled the Arab-Israeli conflict through its proxies in Lebanon and Gaza – Hezbollah and Hamas, respectively.

If street demonstrations do lead to regime change in Iran, Hezbollah and Hamas could lose their Iranian patron and their major arms supplier, and the prospects for Israeli-Arab accommodation would improve dramatically. A new regime also could put the brakes on the Iranian nuclear threat to Israel.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu goes even further.

"Under a different regime, the peaceful relations we used to have with Iran could be re-established," he declared in an interview with the German Bild newspaper.

Israel and Iran had ties until 1979, when the shah was overthrown and exiled.

This best-case scenario, however, is also the most unlikely.

More likely, Ahmadinejad and the radical ayatollahs led by Ali Khamenei will remain in power. Even if this is the case, however, they will be seen to have rigged the election and then used force to suppress the popular will. The regime will be perceived more widely as brutally suppressive, will lose international legitimacy and, if it persists with its nuclear weapons' program, could face a much tougher sanctions regime than otherwise would have been the case.

Iran in the future may need to be more attuned to domestic concerns and spend less on outside forces such as Hezbollah and Hamas. This scenario, too, would be favourable for Israel.

If Mousavi comes to power by forcing and winning a new election, he may be ready for a deal with the West on the nuclear issue. He also is likely to be less virulently anti-Israel than Ahmadinejad, and to provide less support for Hezbollah and Hamas.

Some Israeli analysts fear that this will end up being only half a revolution: Mousavi would come to power, show a more human face of Shiite Islam to the rest of the world, win international plaudits, and defuse criticism and scrutiny of Iran while maintaining the same anti-Israel and nuclear policies as the previous government. Under a cloak of respectability, this Iran could be even more dangerous than Ahmadinejad's, analysts fear.

Several leading Israeli Iran experts see the showdown in Iran as largely a family quarrel between members of the same conservative, clerical elite. They argue that there is not a great deal of difference between Ahmadinejad and Khamenei and the only slightly less conservative Mousavi, who is backed by Ayatollah Ali Rafsanjani.

Indeed, the protesters seem to be using Mousavi as a rallying figure because they have no genuine reformist of stature to back. By the same token Mousavi, who seeks the presidency to make minor reforms, is happy to use Iranians who want much more than he is offering to build his power base.

The big question for Iran, Israel and the Middle East is whether Mousavi is riding a tiger that at some point may usher in a new more democratic era in Iran, and with it a more malleable and stable Middle East.

Here the role of the armed forces could be crucial. The Iranian Revolutionary Guard surely will remain loyal to the Ahmadinejad-Khamenei regime, but what of the rest of the army? If there is to be a real revolution, army units would have to join the popular protest in relatively large numbers.

Although this doesn't seem likely now, Israeli analysts aren't ruling it out. They point out that despite Iran's unprecedented oil revenues over the past few years, the economy is in tatters because of heavy spending on exporting the Iranian revolution rather than on bettering the lives of the Iranian people.

Most analysts agree that Israel should not interfere or give any semblance of interfering in Iran, as to do so almost certainly would be counterproductive. Still, both Netanyahu and President Shimon Peres have expressed strong empathy for the Iranian protesters.

"It's a regime whose real nature has been unmasked, and it's been unmasked by an incredible act of courage by Iran's citizens," Netanyahu told NBC.

In the regional divide between pro-Iranian radicals and pro-western moderates, Israel and Egypt are on the same side, together with other key countries such as Saudi Arabia and Jordan. A major shake-up in Iran could reshape the regional architecture and perhaps pave the way for far-reaching rapprochement between Israel and its neighbours.

U.S. talks with Tehran still possible

JERUSALEM — Despite questions about the legitimacy of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's re-election and his belligerent anti-American rhetoric, the White House remains open to discussions with Iran over its nuclear ambitions.

"It's in the United States' national interest to make sure that we have employed all elements at our disposal, including diplomacy, to prevent Iran from achieving that nuclear capacity," Susan Rice, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Sunday.

As protesters filled the streets of Iranian cities after the disputed vote, Ahmadinejad accused the West of stoking the unrest, singling out Britain and the United States for allegations of meddling. Iran expelled two British diplomats last week and Britain responded in kind. Iran detained nine British Embassy employees Saturday and released four.

Ahmadinejad has said he would make the U.S. regret its criticism of the post-election crackdown and said the mask has been removed from U.S. President Barack Obama's efforts to improve relations.

Rice said Sunday that Ahmadinejad was falling back on his government's usual strategy of blaming the West and the United States in particular for its internal problems.

"The legitimacy of the government, while questioned by the people of Iran, is not the critical issue for the U.S. goal of preventing Iran from developing a nuclear capability," Rice said.

Both Rice and David Axelrod, Obama's top adviser, said Ahmadinejad doesn't appear to have the final say over Iran's foreign policy. Axelrod dismissed Ahmadinejad's harsh language and said being open to talks with Iran is not an effort to reward the country.

White House officials pointed to Obama's remarks last week, urging engagement. "My expectation would be ... that you're going to continue to see some multilateral discussions with Iran," Obama said Friday.

Officials in Washington said they want Iranian officials at the negotiating table – which, they say, was not destroyed during the post-election demonstrations in Iran.

"We are also mindful of the fact that the nuclear weapons in Iran and the nuclearization of that whole region is a threat to that country, all countries in the region, and the world," Axelrod said.

Meanwhile on Monday, Iran said five out of the nine detained local staff at the British Embassy in Tehran had been released, while the other four were being held for questioning, state television reported.

Iranian authorities say 17 protesters and eight members of the volunteer Basij militia have been killed in two weeks of unrest and that hundreds of people have been arrested.

Israel asks Russia not to sell missiles to Iran

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Relations between Israel and Russia have grown tense over a significant change in Moscow's attitude regarding the possible sale of S-300 air defence missiles to Iran, with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu calling his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Putin, and asking him to prevent the arms deal from going through.

Ahead of a meeting between U.S. President Barack Obama and his Russian counterpart, Dmitry Medvedev, next week, Israel has begun an international effort to pressure Russia not to complete the sale of the advanced air defence system.

The deal between Russia and Iran for the sale was signed more than a year ago, but external pressure, primarily from the United States and Israel, led Russia's political leadership to delay its implementation.

The Russian response to Israeli inquiries on the matter had been that they don't intend to complete the deal. The same message was reiterated during Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov's visit to Israel last month.

A senior political source in Jerusalem said that in recent weeks there has been noticeable change in Russia's position on the matter of the arms sale.

The deterioration was first noticed during the visit of Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman to Moscow several weeks ago. Lieberman, who prides himself on his close ties with the Russian leadership, was surprised to hear the Russians presenting a position on the missile deal that was contrary to their earlier stance.

Medvedev told Lieberman that Russia has a signed contract with Iran and some payments had already been made.

"There is an economic crisis at this time, and we are having a very difficult time," the Russian president explained to the Israeli minister.

Defence Minister Ehud Barak met last month with the Russian chief of staff, Gen. Nicolai Makarov, at the Paris Airshow and asked that he also intervene to prevent the sale.

The S-300 is considered to be one of the most advanced air defence systems in the world. Its capabilities allow it to intercept aircraft flying 30,000 metres up from 150 kilometers away.

Foundation helps the disadvantaged in Tel Aviv

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Tel Aviv Foundation works quietly but effectively.

Supporting projects and programs that don't receive funding through regular budgetary means, the 32-year-old foundation works co-operatively with the Israeli seaside city to improve the lives of its economically disadvantaged residents.

"Almost 40 per cent of Tel Aviv's inhabitants live in very deprived neighbourhoods," Abraham Ben-Shoshan, the foundation's director general, said in a recent interview in Toronto. "Our foundation helps them."

Financially backed by Jews in the Diaspora and Israel, as well as Tel Aviv's municipality, it works in four different but overlapping fields: education, welfare, art, culture and music, and quality of life (parks and playgrounds).

"For every dollar we raise, we receive $1 from the city of Tel Aviv," explained Ben-Shoshan, who has headed the foundation for the past seven years.

In the past three decades, the foundation has worked on 400 projects and programs, raised about $200 million (US) and received matching funds of $200 million from Tel Aviv, which is marking its centenary this year.

By his estimate, Canadian Jews provide 15 per cent of its funding, while American Jews give half. The rest comes from Israel, Europe, Latin America, Asia and Australia.

The current global recession has had adverse ramifications, said Ben-Shoshan, the former commander of Israel's navy.

"We raised $17 million in 2007, but only $8 million last year. A few of our donors were invested with Bernard Madoff, and that has had an impact."

Yet he's optimistic.

"Having been in the navy, I learned that weather is changeable" said Ben-Shoshan, who commanded the navy from 1985 to 1989 and believes he was its first Sephardi commander.

Abraham Ben-Shoshan

"You have to have courage to survive. That's what I learned."

He knows he can depend on the Diaspora.

"The Jewish People, whatever their situation, are always willing to support Israel, even if they don't agree with its policies."

The foundation, whose projects and programs benefit the poor, new immigrants and single-parent families, has established more than 40 kindergartens, a science centre for high school students and 12 libraries.

"Israel has few natural resources," said Ben-Shoshan, 69, who immigrated to Palestine from Turkey with his family in 1946. "So we promote our brain power."

The foundation – whose Canadian representative is Marra Messinger – has also built five Cafe Europas, which meet the social needs of the elderly population in general and of 30,000 Holocaust survivors in particular.

"For them, it's a psychological lifesaver," he said.

In addition, the foundation has built parks and playgrounds in every neighbourhood and channelled funds to the Jewish Arab Community Centre in Jaffa.

"If we didn't exist, the quality of life of people in deprived areas would be much worse," said Ben-Shoshan, who was director general of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs before accepting his present position.

"Our foundation is one of the most effective and efficient in terms of wise spending," he added, noting that its 10 per cent overhead is considerably lower than other social welfare and educational agencies in Israel.

Currently, the foundation requires funds to renovate two elementary school libraries and build kindergartens, daycare centres and after-school facilities with hot meals.

The foundation also wants to rehabilitate a late-19th-century synagogue and turn it back into a functioning shul, buy musical instruments for a music centre, help disabled students, expand the Cafe Europa concept, and feed the elderly poor.

"For me, this is a mission," said Ben-Shoshan. "I could have been a diplomat or an arms dealer, but I chose this."

Sharansky elected Jewish Agency head

JTA

JERUSALEM – Natan Sharansky was unanimously elected to head the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Sharansky was elected chairman last Thursday by the agency's board of governors at its meeting in Jerusalem. He was to be sworn in the same day.

His nomination for the four-year term by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had sparked controversy as the Jewish Agency works to assert its independence from political influence.

Sharansky, a former prisoner of Zion in the old Soviet Union, most recently served as chairman of the Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem.

He was sentenced to 13 years imprisonment and hard labor in a Soviet prison in 1977 after he applied for an exit visa to Israel. After years of international pressure, including a massive rally in Washington, Sharansky was released in 1986 and went directly to Israel.

Sharansky founded the immigrant political party Yisrael B'Aliya in 1996 to accelerate the absorption of the massive numbers of Russian immigrants into Israeli society. Between 1996 and 2005, he served as a minister in successive governments.

Leonard Cohen to perform

International music legend Leonard Cohen will perform in Ramallah two days after his upcoming performance in Ramat Gan, Ha'aretz has learned. The concert in Ramallah will be on Sept. 26, in the Palestinian city's Cultural Palace. About 1,000 fans are expected to attend. Cohen's decision came after pro-Palestinian activists attempted to dissuade the singer from performing in Israel. The activists had urged supporters to "apply pressure during his tour by local groups along his path," in an appeal circulated on various pro-Palestinian mailing lists. The sponsor of Cohen's concert in Israel, Discount Bank, confirmed the event; it is scheduled to take place at Ramat Gan Stadium on Sept. 24.

G8 demands settlement halt

The foreign ministers of the Group of Eight countries have called on Israel to halt all West Bank settlement construction. The statement from the G8 ministers, who meet in Italy on Friday, also urged the Israelis and Palestinians to "re-enter direct negotiations on all standing issues consistent with the 'road map' [peace plan]," according to media reports. The Quartet on Middle East peacemaking – which includes the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations – was also scheduled to meet Friday. That meeting was slated to include a session with a group of Arab League nations. The G8 includes the United States, the United Kingdom, Russia, France, Germany, Japan, Canada, France and Italy.

IDF keeps lower profile

Israel's army will largely keep its forces out of four large Palestinian cities in the West Bank. The Israeli Defence Forces said it will strengthen the Palestinian Authority by remaining out of Kalkilya, Ramallah, Jericho and Bethlehem, according to reports. The move comes after the army recently removed several West Bank checkpoints in order to allow Palestinian residents free movement in the area. Soldiers would still enter the cities in order to thwart imminent attacks. Palestinian forces had been operating during the day and the Israeli army overnight.

Ex-ministers jailed

Two former Israeli cabinet members were sentenced to prison terms. Abraham Hirschson, an ex-finance minister, was sentenced by a Tel Aviv court to five years and five months in prison, plus a fine of more than $114,000, for embezzling about $500,000 from the National Labor Federation during his tenure as chairman of the organization. Hirschson was convicted June 8 of larceny, executive theft, fraud, breach of trust, illicitly obtaining funds, money laundering and falsifying corporate documents. Israel's Supreme Court sentenced former Shas lawmaker Shlomo Benizri to four years in prison and a fine of more than $63,000 following his conviction last year on bribery charges. The High Court sentence was more than double the prison term handed down last year by the Jerusalem District Court, which Benizri appealed. In their decision, the justices said they increased the sentence in order to fight corruption by Israeli officials.

Israeli drafted in first round

An Israeli basketball player was picked in the first round of the NBA Draft for the first time. Omri Casspi was selected by the Sacramento Kings as the 23rd pick in the draft. Israeli players had been selected in the second round of the draft three previous times. A first-round pick receives a guaranteed multi-year contract, while a second-round pick's contract is not required to be guaranteed – meaning if the player is cut from the team, he will not be paid. The 21-year-old Casspi is a six-foot-nine forward who helped lead his Maccabi Tel Aviv team to a league championship last year, averaging 12.6 points per game, according to media reports. He also was named to the all-league team and is a member of the Israeli national team. "I can't speak," Casspi said, tears pouring down his face, according to the Associated Press. "I've been waiting for this moment all my life. I'm as happy as can be. We made history. I feel like I am in a dream," he said.

Radio host Larry Green has got that swing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In a world torn by strife, change and instability, broadcaster Larry Green is a constant and assuring presence in the lives of Torontonians who have never even met him.

Green, a seasoned pro, is the host of two shows on Jazz FM 91 – Afternoon Drive and Jazzology, which are respectively broadcast on weekdays from 2 to 6 p.m. and on Thursdays from 9 to 10 p.m.

"Larry contributes to the station on so many levels," said Ross Porter, the president and chief executive officer of Jazz FM. "As a veteran broadcaster, he is a valuable resource for all that works here. His knowledge of jazz is encyclopedic. Larry's relaxed, easy-to-talk-to manner makes him a natural host."

"I love what I do," said Green, who was born and raised in Toronto's Kensington Market neighbourhood. "I'm happy."

Green's infectious personality shines through, whether he introducing a Sonny Rollins recording, waxing reverentially on Oscar Peterson or throwing in a Yiddish word or two.

Beyond this, listeners are always struck by Green's familiarity with the music he adores.

"Music has been a major part of my life," said Green, who played the saxophone in a band and took lessons with two of Canada's greatest musicians, Moe Kaufman and Morris Weinsweig.

Green, 69, the only child of Polish Jews, picked up an interest in music in general and in jazz in particular in Kensington Market.

"It was very multicultural, with different musical influences," he said.

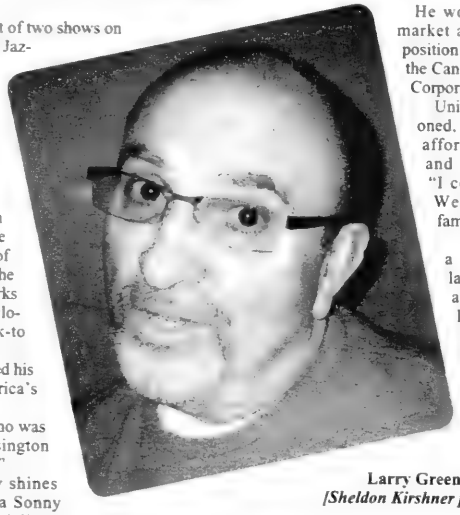
He did not grow up with a silver spoon in his mouth. Fred Greenstein, his father, barely made ends meet.

"He did various and sundry things," Green recalled in an interview at one of his favourite restaurants in the Beaches, where he currently lives. "He had a tough life."

Had fate not intervened, Green may have gone on to be a professional musician.

He was flying high as a saxophonist in a band that played at Ontario Jewish resorts when he was involved in a car accident in which he broke his jaw.

Sidelined as a musician, Green – a graduate of Talmud Torah and Oakwood Collegiate – took what jobs were available.



Larry Green

He worked in a supermarket and then landed a position in the mailroom of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

University never beckoned, since he could not afford the tuition fees and associated costs. "I couldn't afford it. We were not a rich family."

Green's days as a mailboy did not last long. Del Mott, a CBC announcer, liked Green and took him under his wing.

"He thought I was made for more than a mailroom," he said.

He stayed for two years, while living in a room with only a bed and a hot plate. He hosted a rhythm and blues show, and learned how to run specialized equipment.

"I also learned to be careful about what I said on air."

After Niagara Falls, Green worked for stations in Oshawa, Guelph, Penticton, Vancouver and Winnipeg, honing his skills as a radio personality.

Lured by the bright lights of America, Green went to work for K-Jazz in San Francisco, still the pre-eminent jazz station in the United States.

Much to his regret, he had to leave far sooner than expected, sent packing back to Canada as an illegal worker.

For the next decade, Green earned his livelihood at CHUM FM in Toronto. He was a jack-of-all trades, doing the afternoon show and writing commercials and promotions.

"I learned how to write and that was a real skill to my benefit."

Unable to advance into the ranks of management, Green quit, landing up as the marketing manager of a local record company.

Always on the look out for better opportunities, Green jumped ship when Warner Brothers hired him as its national promotion manager.

In this capacity, he was in charge of, among other things, promoting releases from Atlantic Records.

"They utilized my experience in radio," said Green. "I was a perfect candidate for the job."

Staying at Warner Brothers for 16 years, his longest-lasting job, Green made a name for himself in the industry.

Subsequently, he was an operations manager and program director for Telemedia, a Quebec-based company, and a booking agent for radio and television talent.

He also hosted a music show on Citytv and a kids' program on CBC-TV, and taught at Humber College.

"I don't script anything in advance," he said. "I ad lib. And that's what jazz is. There's a lot to talk about. Sometimes, I have to pull myself back if I'm too wordy. Basically, I want to be an entertaining guy playing music."

On occasion, he blurts out Yiddish words such as gatkes and bris. "I never plan it. It just comes out."

"Very rarely do radio hosts have control over these things," he explained. "Sure, I sometimes feel constrained, but I'm a professional and can work with the system. That's the honest answer. But I have the ability to make suggestions, and more often than not they accept them. It's not a closed door. I have room to negotiate."

Although he has been complimented for his mellifluous voice, Green is skeptical. "I don't think I have a great, deep, classic radio voice. Most people think I sound like Regis Philbin."

Green, who has been single since his divorce in the 1980s, wants to be known as a nice, regular guy to whom an audience can relate.

"That's the kind of a relationship I want to have with my listeners," he said.

Plenty of variety at Toronto's Fringe Festival

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

With 150 productions of every type, The Fringe, Toronto's largest theatre festival, has plenty of variety.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish-Wiccan Wedding is a musical comedy based on a true story.

"It's basically the story about how my mother moved from Saskatchewan to Ottawa and in the process discovered her lesbianism and rediscovered her Judaism," the musical's co-writer David Hein says. "It's about how she came out to me, both as a lesbian and a Jew."

The musical features Stratford and Shaw festivals alumnus Lisa Horner as Claire Goldstein, as she comes out to her teenage son, ex-husband and homophobic Jewish mother.

"It's 95 per cent true," Hein says. "People have said it's a love letter to my moms."

His mother's wedding was held under a chupah and had the traditional breaking of the glass, as well as the not-so-traditional jumping over a pail with a broom.

"It's a lovely story about how they reconciled their beliefs," Hein said. "Things that I find typical, everyone thinks is bizarre."

He says when his mother came out, he found it easier to understand his mother as a lesbian than as a Jew.

"I was aware my family was Jewish, but we didn't celebrate any holidays or anything. It was stranger to me than her coming out as a lesbian. I had no idea what I was supposed to do."

The musical features 20 songs written by Hein, including Don't Take Your Lesbian Moms to Hooters.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish-Wiccan Wedding is performed at the Bread & Circus Theatre in Kensington Market, 299 Augusta Ave.

A relationship of different sorts between two women is the subject of the comedy Build a Bridge and Get Over It.

"It's about two girls who come from completely different backgrounds, who spend a weekend at a self-help retreat in north Ontario," says co-writer and actor Lori Pearlstein.

Kathy Mulligan and Jessica Goldman are two unlikely cabin mates who find themselves shut away in the woods surrounded by drum circles, primal scream therapy and parsnip burgers.

"My character [Jessica] is a young Jewish professional, and the other character is a lesbian with no educational background. The play is about how we judge people on superficial issues."

Pearlstein says she knows many people who have faced severe hardships in their lives but got over it.

"I know someone who had a child die," she says. "Some let these hardships ruin their lives, but others don't. And if they can get over stuff like that, then I can get through the little things."

Pearlstein once worked at a retirement home where several residents were Holocaust survivors. One woman, she recalls, would tell a joke each morning.

My Mother's Lesbian Jewish-Wiccan Wedding

"If they can laugh after what they've been through, it puts everything in perspective," Pearlstein says.

She said that she wants this play to inspire people. "It is possible to wake up with a smile each day. I wanted to write a play that got people to question where they find the answers and if there even is one right answer."

Slam poetry contest winner Ariel Platt writes and performs her one-woman show Down to the Underwire, a stream-of-consciousness monologue that touches upon every possible subject.

"Parts are 'laugh-out-loud' and parts are more dramatic," Platt says. "I cover a wide range of things, from heartbreak to eating bacon, to my family. Basically, life in general and what it's like to grow up in Toronto."

She delivers her monologue in spoken word poems. "Spoken word poetry is poetry for everyone. It's more conversational, like rap or hip hop. It's not 'snobby' poetry," she explains. "It's not like Shakespeare or anything."

She says she tries to infuse her sense of humour into her work so that people can laugh one minute and be struck by her sheer honesty the next.

"I write about my experiences and relationships that are quite personal, but often I think people can relate to them quite well. I say what many people are feeling but just don't say in casual conversation."

Her performance is a high-energy, staccato delivery; a series of three-minute poems. "It's all about performance. It's poetry from the stage not from the page."

Platt has a theatre background and has performed in slam poetry contests and at numerous events, including Cool Jew Cabaret.

Down to the Underwire has a "unique style for a Fringe show and something to which audiences can relate and find inspiring," she says.

More like something out of Cirque de Soleil, Head First, produced, created and performed by Femmes du Feu, is a bare knuckle, death-defying, aerial dance with a hefty dose of indie rock.

Performed by an all-female cast, Head First has two aerial dance pieces choreographed by Holly Treddenick and Sabrina Pringle, which combine expression, physicality and dance.

Finally, Bags: Obsession of a Hoardaholic, written and performed by Lee Michael Buckman, explores obsessive personalities.

"When I was writing this show, I thought I was outing my freak, but the more I spoke to people about it and heard their own experiences with obsessive nature, the more I realized how human and universal it was," Buckman says.

"The extra pens you stash in your desk. The packets of Sweet'N Low from the coffee shop. That was my mother's favourite. We found hundreds of them stashed in her stuff after she died. Or even hoarding your heart. I began this project to out myself as a hoarder and discovered we are all indeed hoarding something."

Bags: Obsessions of a Hoardaholic will be performed at the historic Glen Morris Theatre, at 4 Glen Morris St. (3 streets south of Bloor St.W., just east of Spadina Ave.).

The Fringe runs from July 1 to 12 at various venues around the city. Admission is $10. For dates, times and information on these and other performances, visit www.fringetoronto.com. Call the Fringe Hotline at 416-966-1062 or 1-866-515-7799. You can also buy tickets at the Fringe Club at 292 Brunswick Ave.

ALLAN KING WAS GEMINI-AWARD WINNER

Vancouver-born filmmaker Allan King, who left his mark with such notable documentary films as Warrendale and A Married Couple, died in Toronto in mid-June at age 79.

King began working at the CBC in the 1950s and also worked for the BBC. Released in 1967, the CBC-commissioned film Warrendale offered a dramatic look inside a home for emotionally disturbed children. Because of its swearing and gritty realism, CBC refused to air the film, which played in movie theatres and became a requisite part of modern film study courses.

Love and Human Extinction* is a tragicomedy by Shaista Justin.

A Married Couple (1970), King's deeply intimate study of the emotional highs and lows of a marriage in turmoil, also set a new standard for cinéma vérité. The director's feature films included Who Has Seen the Wind (1976) and his television work included many episodes of Road to Avonlea. Among other honours, he won a Gemini Award and was appointed an officer of the Order of Canada.

TVOntario is airing a retrospective of King's work with seven groundbreaking documentaries, July 5 to 10.

Fringe Festival: Here are details of a few of the more than 150 Fringe Theatre Festival events around Toronto over the next 10 days or so. Eccentricity seems to be a common characteristic, but some of the entries may also be memorable and outstanding. For more details, call the Fringe hotline, 416-966-1062, or check out the website at www.fringetoronto.com.

• My Mother's Lesbian Jewish-Wiccan Wedding, a musical comedy by David Hein and Irene Carl, features hilarious songs, a live band, and a cast of 10. The story follows Claire Goldstein as she takes a female lover, discovers her lesbian sexuality, rediscovers her Jewish faith, and comes out to her son, ex-husband and mother. $10. Bread & Circus Theatre, 299 Augusta Ave. July 1 to 12.

• Love and Human Extinction, a tragicomedy by Shaista Justin, delivers a post-apocalyptic story about a businessman and construction worker who compete for the last woman alive. Justin's book, Winter the Unwelcome Visitor, was endorsed by Nobel prize-winner J.M. Coetzee. The thought-provoking, three-person play is at the Royal St. George Theatre, 120 Howland, on July 2, and runs through July 11. $10. www.fringetoronto.com

• Bags: Obsessions of a Hoardaholic is a one-man show written and performed by Lee Michael Buckman. $10. Glen Morris Theatre, intermittently from July 1 to 11.

• A bathroom on the third floor of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre is the set of Puck Bunny, a play about hockey. Tickets are $10 to this Sheep in Fog production from Montreal. At Miles Nadal JCC most days to July 12.

• After appearances in Ottawa and Montreal, Australian performer-director Jonno Katz has brought his fifth solo show, The Accident, to the Toronto Fringe. $10. George Ignatieff Theatre, 15 Devonshire Place, intermittently from July 4 to 12. www.epicworlds.com

Maya Rabinovitch writes and directs I Will Not Hatch, a comedy about a woman taking an uneventful plane ride that's doomed to end in perfectly mindless tragedy. Suzie and the nine other passengers on this flight have roughly 30,000 feet left to live as she attempts to save the world from the danger she knows is lurking.

It stars Erin Fleck and Andrew Cheng. $10.

Young Rabbi Becomes Messiah: At first glance,

How Jesus Became Christian, Barrie Wilson's recently published exploration of the Jewish roots of Christianity, is a remarkable book simply by virtue of its existence. Imagine a similar work that offers a similarly provocative view of Mohammed – no doubt it would be greeted by a stream of fatwas and threats from imams, perhaps even fatal riots in the streets of the Muslim world.

How Jesus Became Christian is a deeply scholarly and thought-provoking take on a thoroughly Jewish historical figure whose disciples transformed his legend almost beyond recognition. Accessible and well-written, the book garnered a well-deserved Canadian Jewish Book Award last month. Published by Vintage Canada, it will interest anyone concerned with the historical Jesus and his Jewish roots.

Wilson is a Torontonian who converted to Judaism some years ago and has been involved with the downtown Kiever congregation for many years.

'Public statements, not beliefs,' spurred Koffler Centre decision

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lori Starr, executive director of Toronto's Koffler Centre of the Arts, wants to make one thing clear.

The centre's decision in May to disassociate from Reena Katz' exhibit about the history of Kensington Market was not about the 33-year-old artist's personal convictions or beliefs, Starr told The CJN.

Rather, she said, it had to do with her "public statements that undermine Israel as a Jewish state."

According to Katz' Facebook page – which Starr saw only after the centre had made plans to co-sponsor her exhibit with the Toronto art festival Luminato – she is a member of the social networking website's groups Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, Oppose the Motion to Condemn Israeli Apartheid Week, and "No Place for Israeli Products Here" Campaign.

The centre, which had provided $20,000 to the exhibit, did not pull its funding. Baycrest, whose seniors were integral to the exhibit's interactive component, withdrew its support just before the scheduled opening date of May 20. It was to have run in Kensington Market until July 26.

Fallout from the Koffler's decision included the resignation of one of its 21 board members.

As well, four of 26 artists who were scheduled to be part of the Wrecking Ball – a fundraiser and celebration of the centre held June 18 – withdrew from the event.

However, Starr noted, "a number of" other artists contacted the Koffler Centre after the Katz incident and donated works to the silent auction held as part of the event.

On Katz' website, eachhand.org, the artist, along with independent curator Kim Simon, wrote in a May 15 letter that their request to meet with the Koffler board of directors had been rejected.

Communication between the Koffler Centre and Katz is now being done through lawyers, Starr confirmed.

She declined to elaborate, other than to say they are discussing the fulfilment of contractual obligations, and there is no current lawsuit.

The Koffler receives public funding from Canada Council, the Toronto Arts Council and the Ontario Arts Council.

Claire Hopkinson, executive director of the city-funded Toronto Arts Council (TAC), told The CJN that the Koffler Centre has been "a valued client since 1999." The centre receives $50,000 annually from the TAC – representing just under half of Koffler's government funding – for operating costs, but not for projects, through the council's visual media arts program. (Koffler's total annual operating budget is $1.5 million, which mostly comes from donors, patrons and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.)

Among the criteria for receiving the TAC funding are responsible budgeting, quality of the curatorial work, accessibility issues, value to the community, how well the organization is run, and conformity to policies of the City of Toronto, including human rights and non-discrimination, Hopkinson said.

"Currently we are in discussion with the Koffler as a partner, with regard to… issues that have arisen," she said. "I can't say more than that… Our first communication has to be with a client. We'll be meeting with them in the very near future."

"We're in dialogue with the [arts] councils," said Starr.

In a public letter to the community (posted online at www.kofflerarts.org), Starr said that Israel's "well-being and existence as a Jewish state is a core value" of the centre. "No organization could be expected to partner with an individual who actively works against one of its core values."

Starr, who is on the steering committee of the Council of American Jewish Museums, told The CJN that the centre "has no intention of preventing anyone from being critical of Israel's policies… However, our centre, like our community, is committed to Israel's existence as a Jewish state."

She said the centre, which is an agency of UJA Federation, has a history of "developing and presenting artistic works that reflect a diversity of ideas and expressions and debate about Israel's policies."

The Koffler's mission, according to its website, is "to create a more civil and global society by fostering mutual understanding through the exploration of arts and culture."

The centre has learned "a valuable lesson about due diligence," Starr said. "I think that what we've learned is that while we'll still continue to make our decisions first and foremost based on the quality of work as we move forward, we need to perhaps take into account, redefine what it would mean for us as a Jewish cultural institution doing more due diligence."

"You have to engage in a more thorough research process that brings you beyond artistic matters."

The centre's disassociation from Katz's exhibit sparked "an enormous number of e-mails and phone calls," said Starr. "We've had hundreds supporting our actions… and we've also had – I wouldn't say hundreds – but we have had a smaller proportion of letters, e-mails and voice-mails from those who are rather confused about the actions we took" or are out-and-out negative.

"Some people have been confused that they thought we cancelled the exhibition or censored the artist… and there have been a number of voices who have expressed concern to us" over a cultural institution taking such a step.

Starr said she is "actively engaging" in discussion with people in the arts community who are "committed to civil dialogue. I'm reaching out to those who have expressed their concern.

In an e-mail to The CJN, Katz said that she's "deeply saddened and frustrated by the polarized situation Koffler has created in their unprofessional choices. These include: immediately going public with a press release slandering me; refusing my request to meet with their board of directors to clarify my political position; and violating the Toronto Arts Council's anti-discrimination policy, which they signed in receipt of programming funding."

She added that "Koffler's claim that my public position regarding anti-Zionism supports the extinction of the State of Israel is ridiculous and defamatory. I support democratic reform, not abolitionism. Our community desperately needs to end the silencing of dissent around Israel/Palestine, and open itself to respectful internal debate."

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Adam Sol has a thing for prophets like Matisyahu has a thing for reggae. Two out of his three poetry books are titled with biblical prophets – Jonah's Promise (2000) and, recently, Jeremiah, Ohio (2008).

The Toronto poet's work is loaded with Jewish references, and it's too easy to credit the rabbis in his family as the main culprit.

"I connect deeply to Judaism," Sol says in an interview from his Toronto home. He says his prophet analogies in his poems are not the sole Judaic influence. Sol, 39, also "draws on the heritage of the great Jewish writers" such as Irving Layton, Philip Roth, A.M. Klein and others.

Adam Sol

His passion for the past has helped him gain momentum in the present. He recently was nominated for a Trillium Book Award for Jeremiah, Ohio, an award he won in 2003 for Crowd of Sounds. He didn't win the provincial $10,000 award, but he nabbed another auspicious honour – he will soon be performing his poetry on one of the most sought-after literary stages of the summer – the annual Scream Festival in High Park in Toronto.

"Not sure what to expect," he says of the outdoor venue, "but I'll push my limits further than I would in a quiet room."

His recent book of poetry may lend itself to a spacious stage ripe for dramatics. Jeremiah, Ohio is a novel-in-poems that follows two lost souls, one a would-be prophet and the other a bright but wandering cupcake delivery man. The book works as a quirky buddy movie when Jeremiah and Buddy ride from Ohio to New York.

Sol made sure to pepper his book with many references to the biblical Jeremiah, so spotting the parallels almost becomes a game in itself. The writer breaks traditional form by including various narrators in the book, especially unusual in a poetry volume.

As is the case with most poets, Sol doesn't make a career out of stanzas and similes. He teaches English at the Laurentian University at Georgian College Program, a job that suits him perfectly. "The classroom works for me. I am forced to read the best literature ever written," he says.

Sol is married with three boys, and his family circle offers him a good dose of Judaica to feed his poetic inspiration. His wife is Rabbi Yael Splansky, the associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple. His sister, Felicia Sol, followed the same path, and is a rabbi at Congregation B'nei Jeshurun in Manhattan.

Along with Judaism, music influences Sol as a writer. Maybe it's his time spent at synagogue. Or hearing the rhythm behind the stories of Samson, Esther or Jonah. "I love seeing how language marries music to meaning," he says. "Rather than plot or character or other devices, it's music that attracted me to writing."

Readers and critics are now flocking to Sol's poems to hear that music he infuses in his own words. It might not be a tune to whistle to, but it's a lasting riff that sings in the cerebrals long after the final period.

Sol is reading as part of The Scream in High Park, on July 13, 7 p.m. Pay what you can, $10 suggested. High Park mainstage. www.thescream.ca

Novel set in Terezin inspired by personal memories

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Auschwitz is the iconic site of much literature dealing with the Holocaust, but Terezin, or as the Germans dubbed it, Theresienstadt, may be the site that has inspired the greatest variety of postwar artistic effort.

This may follow from the artistic wealth of the place itself during wartime, when not only clandestine but public art flourished, partly as a propaganda tool aimed at an international audience.

Norman Ravvin

The camp received a remarkable number of Czech, German and Austrian composers, actors, visual and cinema artists, who not only practiced their art but also held classes for children and created musical venues for public performance. Among them was Karel Ancerl, a leading Czech conductor. The music of Viktor Ullmann and Hans Krása – especially the latter's children's opera, Brundibár – has gained substantial popularity in recent decades. This follows the early and influential books dedicated to art by children at Terezin, most famously I Never Saw Another Butterfly. Published by the State Jewish Museum in Prague in 1959, its appearance in an English edition in 1978 coincided with a substantial increase in Holocaust scholarship and art worldwide.

Terezin's effectiveness as a source of Holocaust education and creativity arises from its singularities: the fact that it was not a death camp; the role of children in its legacy; and the particular form of German madness undertaken there, including the propaganda film The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews.

Monique Polak's What World Is Left (Orca) takes Terezin's history in a personal direction, deriving key aspects of its narrative from her mother's two-year internment there with her family. Among them was her mother's father, Jo Spier, a well-known Dutch newspaper artist before the war. Spier's fictional counterpart in the novel is a Dutch artist named Joseph Van Raalte, and it is through the eyes of his 14-year-old daughter, Anneke, that we come to know Terezin. Like other creative personalities incarcerated by the Germans, Van Raalte plays a part in the propaganda projects undertaken by the camp leadership. As the camp is dressed, almost like a film set, for a visit by Danish Red Cross officials, Anneke wonders if her "father is helping the Nazis carry out their evil plan." She considers, too, how she is "benefiting from my father's situation. It's because of him that we have our own apartment. It's because of him that we haven't been shipped off on a transport. It's because of him that Commandant Rahm sent Opa to us."

As in much Holocaust fiction – even the most gruelling Auschwitz novels and stories of Tadeusz Borowski and Eli Wiesel – the perpetrators are not the narrative's main focus. In What World Is Left Germans make short and brutal appearances and then disappear from sight for long passages. In this, Polak's novel resembles Holocaust memoirs, which focus on the way that people survived, on the experience of victimhood and its postwar legacy.

In her author's note, Polak informs us that her mother did not share the story of her two years in Terezin until more than 60 years after the liberation of the camp. Further family recollections were available in an illustrated book by Polak's grandfather, published in Dutch in 1978.

What World Is Left has been nominated for a major American Library Association award. If it wins, the novel may be destined to become a part of the influential canon of Holocaust fiction inspired by personal memories.

Norman Ravvin's essays on Holocaust literature are collected in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. He is the chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Libman on the mound

Thornhill pitcher heads to Maccabiah Games

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Robbie Libman first got into baseball when he was just three years old.

This summer, the 17-year-old Thornhill native has a chance to put those years of training to the test at the 2009 Maccabiah Games.

Libman, a lefthanded pitcher with the Thornhill Reds, will be representing Maccabi Canada at the games this year in Israel.

This will be Libman's first time in Israel, and he's excited about it.

His team will be playing for the first few days and will spend the rest of the time touring the country. He sees the experience as a good way to reconnect with his Jewish roots beyond Toronto.

"I feel connected to other Jewish people around here, but I don't know about Israel yet, because I've never been there," he said. "I think it will be a learning experience."

Libman, who cites Toronto Blue Jays ace Roy Halladay and former Pittsburgh Penguin great Mario Lemieux as his sports heroes, already has some experience competing against other Jewish athletes. In 2007, he was on the Toronto baseball team that travelled to Orange County, Calif., for the JCC Maccabi (youth) Games.

It was "a lot of fun," he said.

The recent Vaughan Secondary School graduate, who plans to study engineering at Queen's University this fall, is familiar with a few people on his team – including the coach – both from school and from baseball practice, but the group will be meeting as a team for the first time just before they leave for the games.

He also knows some of the players on the Israeli team from a tournament last summer.

"I actually played most of the Israeli team last year in Pittsburgh. They were a good bunch of guys," he said.

It costs $7,500 to send an athlete to the Maccabiah Games and some competitors have had to do some fundraising to cover the cost. That can be an ordeal.

"We did some fundraising a few weeks ago from the bank of mom and dad," he joked. "They're pretty helpful about it."

Canadian team goes for hockey gold in Israel

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Until this year, Danny Schwartz didn't know hockey was played in Israel.

He'd never heard of the Canada Centre in Metulla, or that Israel had a national team that in 2005 won Division II Group B gold at an International Ice Hockey Federation championship.

And he certainly didn't know that Canada had won hockey gold in Metulla at the 1997 Maccabiah Games, or that the late NHL coach Roger Neilson had operated a hockey summer camp there, or that former Montreal Canadiens' bench boss Jean Perron coached Israel's national hockey teams.

He didn't know any of that. Nevertheless, Schwartz will be one of 22 Jewish Canadians – mainly from Quebec and Ontario – making up Team Canada's roster when the team faces off July 5 against Israel at the Israel Ice Hockey Federation's World Jewish Hockey Championships in Metulla.

Canada is sending one senior team (players 18 and older) and two junior squads (under 18) to the tournament, which winds up on July 15.

On June 28, the nine Montreal players head to Toronto for a four-day mini camp. They took off July 1 for Israel, where they'll get four more days to practice and acclimatize themselves before the first game.

Other competing countries will be the favoured United States – which won the first tournament in 2007 – as well as Israel, France and Russia.

"I've been training real hard at the gym and getting on the ice two, three times a week," said the affable 24-year-old, who works in his family's metal recycling business.

Schwartz is a "two-way centre" – meaning he can handle both offensive and defensive duties – and prides himself on being a face-off specialist.

He played in the Quebec junior AAA league for the St. Jerome Panthers and Vaudreuil Mustangs, winning the league's 2004 championship. Also on the Vaudreuil team that year was Kirkland native Jordan Topor, who will also be on the plane to Israel.

Other Montrealers who will be lacing up include goalie Josh Tordjman, who plays for the Phoenix Coyotes in the NHL; defenceman Casey Fazekas, who attends Babson College in Massachusetts; defenceman Oriel McHugh, who has played pro for Oklahoma City; defenceman Phil Levine, who also played Quebec junior AAA, and forwards Eric Satim and Sy Nutkevitch, both NCAA players.

Players hailing from Ontario include Ontario Junior Hockey League defenceman Brendan Schwartz; university forwards Aaron Stein, Mitch Goldenberg and Adam Weinberg; Dustin Laren of the Ontario Junior Hockey League; and Mikki Levy, who's played in the Nova Scotia Junior Hockey League.

The team's coach is Sherry Bassin, general manager and owner of the Erie Otters of the Ontario Hockey League. Bassin has coached Canada to world junior gold medals. Assisting him will be Steve Simmons, a well-known Toronto sportswriter.

"I love the depth on our team," Simmons said. "We have a lot of players who can play various roles and I can't wait to see us on the ice together for the very first time when we get to practice.

"I know the players by name and by reputation, but kids like Kevin Willer, who plays at Elmira College, or Mike Nemirovsky, who is no kid, from the German Elite League, or former [University of Toronto] player Adam Weinberg have all kinds of skill. And I'm interested to see how the young guys like Laren and Brendan Schwartz, just 19-year-olds, will measure up.

"The fact we have an NHL-calibre goalie in Josh Tordjman gives us a great sense of confidence," Simmons added.

"I think we're a good mix," Schwartz said. "From my experience, it's not always the best talent that wins, it's more the team, and I think we're bringing a real team. I think as a team we'll do very, very well. We'll play for each other. When we get to the rink, it's going to be business."

One reason he thinks the team will gel is that almost all the Quebec players hail from the West Island of Montreal and have known and played hockey together since boyhood. Locally, they have "dominated the Jewish hockey community," he said.

Two under-18 teams – Team Canada White and Team Canada Blue – are being coached by former NHLer Steve Thomas and four-time Stanley Cup winner Jeff Beukeboom.

Although Schwartz was not aware before this year of hockey in Israel, he and "almost all" of the Montreal players have been to the Jewish state before, mostly as part of Birthright Israel trips, which Schwartz went on at age 18.

"You feel at home once you're in Israel, so to play our national sport there is going to be extraordinary," he said.

"Needless to say, we're very excited to get going. This should be an experience of a lifetime for everybody," added Simmons.

TIGERS ROAR: The boys baseball team from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto recently concluded a flawless season by winning the Toronto District College Athletic Association (TDCAA) Tier II championship. Following a perfect 6-0 season, during which the Tigers gave up no runs in their first four games, they defeated Chaminade College School in the semifinal 9-6 and followed it up with a 4-1 championship game win over Dante Alighieri Academy. TanebaumCHAT's ace pitcher, David Freiman, pitched more than 20 innings without giving up any runs, earned or unearned. Pictured, back row, from left, are coaches Noah Leszcz and Jake Gallinger, with players Ben Welkovics, Matthew Sitzer, Danny Krikler, Daniel Goldlist and Jonathan Rosenbluth; middle row, from left, David Warshafsky, Ryan Fisch, Freiman and Russell Budd, with coaches Steve Baker and Neil Epstein, and front row, from left, Noah Schwartz, Arie Cote, Zane Brickman and Eric Masters.

A person's essence

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

I have heard this many times from patients or family members: I can't bear the thought of people seeing me or him/her like this.

Sometimes the sentiment becomes a barrier to participation in programs or activities that might be beneficial to the person and provide relief for family members.

I have seen individuals deprived of the potential benefit of attending day programs for seniors with cognitive impairment because the family was concerned that someone might recognize their loved one and realize that he or she had become afflicted with dementia. The family might express a sense of "shame" at the thought that their beloved, previously highly respected member of the community might be seen in a state of dependence, unable to express his or her wondrous lifetime of accomplishments.

Over the years, I have been involved in the care of numerous prominent individuals who have been afflicted with dementia or other conditions that have compromised their cognitive function and/or behaviour. Sometimes members of the staff involved in care know of the person's prominence or may have some notion of his or her previous accomplishments.

In contemporary long-term care facilities, there is often an attempt to provide some place for memorabilia related to the resident's life and interests. It can be a useful way of engaging the person in discussions about his or her life, as distant memories are often preserved even in the face of the inability to retain or remember new information.

I recall one prominent physician I had known quite well during my academic career, whom I sat with during a centre-wide power failure. Staff members were asked to keep clients and residents company, so that they wouldn't feel isolated. There was some recognition of who I was, and during the meanderings of our conversation, I was asked, "And how are you doing?" I answered, "Fine," and went on to talk about activities that he had been involved with in the past, which I believed he might be able to relate to.

He listened carefully and actually made some comments that were relevant, even if somewhat tangential. The fact that he asked the same question of me 10 minutes later, to which I responded in a like manner, did not matter. The important thing for me and for him was that we had a conversation that included important aspects of his life to which he could relate, even if only for some minutes.

Tragically, illnesses such as the dementia of the Alzheimer's disease and other types do not choose those they afflict based on status in society or accomplishments. Even with all the steps that we are told to undertake to decrease the risks of these diseases, about one-third of individuals over the age of 85 will be afflicted. How our families cope with the implications of the illness and what are often years of gradual decline and dependency is the real challenge.

One thing, however, I can stress is that pride and vanity should not interfere with steps that might provide a beneficial interaction or activity for the loved one. I recall seeing a picture of the late U.S. president Ronald Reagan, who had Alzheimer's, raking leaves, a task he could apparently do based on long-remembered rote tasks that gave him some satisfaction.

The key message for families is to move beyond the need for pride and accept the reality for what it is, and make every moment and any opportunity for meaningful interactions, however limited, available for your loved one and for those devoted to and caring for him.

Get grilling, in a healthy way!

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

With the barbecue season upon us, we are tempted to barbecue as often as possible. Here are some tips to allow you to grill all summer long in a healthy way.

Choose lean meats such as skinless chicken; turkey; fish; lean, smaller cuts of beef; burgers made from ground chicken; turkey or veal. Throw lots of veggies on the grill, too, as grilled vegetables are tasty. Try peppers, onions, mushrooms, zucchini, asparagus, corn or any other vegetable. This is a great way to get a big serving of veggies. Make extra to use the next day in a salad, omelette, sandwich, wrap or pita pocket.

For healthiest grilling, avoid charring or burning food, as this can leave potential carcinogens. however, food must still be thoroughly cooked. Use an instant-read thermometer to be sure of internal temperatures. Even precooked meats such as hot dogs should be thoroughly cooked. Use lower or indirect heat to avoid burning meat but make sure it's done.

Marinating is a healthy way to prepare meats for a barbecue, as it adds flavour and creates a bit of a barrier to prevent some of the hazardous carcinogens from forming.

There are also barbecue tools that can make grilling small or delicate foods easier. Look for vegetable baskets and racks for fish, kebobs and satays.

Wash all utensils, plates, counters and hands that have come in contact with raw meat. Do not reuse marinades that have had raw meat in them, and defrost and marinate all foods in the refrigerator, not at room temperature. Once cooked, food should be consumed within about one to two hours, depending on the temperature outside. Wrap leftovers and put them in the fridge or discard them. Happy grilling!

Rediscovering baseball, and shul

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It had been 20 years since I stood at the plate and held a bat high above my head, my toes digging into the sand and my eye focused on the pitcher.

On May 21, that changed.

For a couple of decades now, an Orthodox shul baseball league has taken to the parks in Downsview and Thornhill to battle for the coveted honour of being the best. This year, during my 12-month period of cardio rehabilitation, I asked my nephew, Ezra Rosenzweig – a natural athlete who walks with the athletic majesty of basketball great Kobe Bryant – if he could secure me a position on the Clanton Park Synagogue shul team.

I don't attend Clanton Park, but the rules have changed over time to allow for free agent daveners. Ezra approached the manager of the team, Immanuel "Gee" Greenberg, a very fine person, with my request.

I waited by the phone like a rookie waiting for the results of the draft. It rang. Ezra was on the line.

"We have a spot for you," he said. "It will cost you $150 for the season, but you'll get a jersey."

A jersey! Man, this is better than I could have possibly imagined! Questions, questions, questions. Will I wash it in hot water or cold? Should I use my $20, second-hand, first basemen's glove, or the fine-leather Wilson fielder's glove that I received in a trade for a 1984 Ford?

I was nervous. All the guys on the team are half my age, with strength comparable to that of the biblical King David. What would I muster at the plate and in the field? What could I draw upon when facing down a formidable and God-fearing pitcher from Shomrai Shabbos synagogue?

Game day arrived, and sure enough, that old friend, the pre-game jitters, came to visit.

I walked onto the Clanton Park baseball diamond, just off Palm Drive, and tossed the ball around with my teammates – the 2008 shul champions. I felt an immediate camaraderie with them and was taken by their respect for this "old guy" with a paunch and stale throwing arm who was giving baseball a second shot.

Soon, it was my turn at bat. I was sweating. I was sixth in the order. The next game I would be No. 8.

The first pitch was a courteous one. I swung. Damn! I pulled my hamstring and missed the ball entirely.

The pitcher touched his tzitzit. He was serious. He pitched again. I was in pain (and would be for the entire game).

"Strike 2!" I could hear my heart beating as loud as the sound of the shofar.

The next pitch would be mine. Like Danny in Chaim Potok's The Chosen, my first at-bat was a religious experience.

The pitch made its way into the strike zone, an easy lob tailored just for me. I could hear the thworp the ball would make once I connected. "Strike 3!" the umpire yelled. I stood there, Charlie Brownish, then smiled and walked back to the bench.

The boys patted me on the back and reverentially said, "Way to go. Next time."

I went 0 for 5 that night. But things got better and in game 2. I walked twice, hit two singles, got a couple of RBIs, and pulled my hamstring again.

I was given the game ball.

Whenever I play, I smile for every moment of every inning, because after 20 years on the sidelines, I'm part of the finest frum shul league team in North America, with the greatest bunch of guys.

I am a ball player, and after years of searching, I have finally discovered a shul experience that works for me. Play ball!

Peres offers to meet Saudi king

By HILA RAZ
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Shimon Peres invited Saudi King Abdullah last Wednesday to come to Jerusalem or to meet with him in Riyadh to initiate discussions that could open the door to the implementation of a comprehensive peace between Israel and all the Arab states.

Peres was speaking at an interfaith conference in Kazakhstan, addressing some 150 religious leaders from around the world, including a large delegation of imams, and called on King Abdullah to meet with him in Jerusalem, in Riyadh, or in any other place, "in order to fulfil his prayer for peace between all people, without differences of religion."

He praised a 2002 Arab peace initiative that offers Israel full normalization in return for a withdrawal from territory conquered in the 1967 Six Day War, a Palestinian state and an equitable solution to the Palestinian refugee problem.

Peres quoted Jordanian King Abdullah II as calling the plan "a readiness for peace between the State of Israel and 57 Arab and Muslim states."

Peres also spoke about Islamist terrorism.

"Thousands, if not millions of Muslims, have lost their lives at the hands of extremists that call the name of Allah," Peres said. "In the twin towers of New York, Christians, Muslims, Jews, Buddhists and atheists, all lost their lives as one."

Iranian delegates stormed out of the opening session of the interfaith conference as Peres began to deliver his address to the forum.

The delegates returned to the conference hall after Peres finished speaking.

About 80 delegations participated in the summit, representing different faiths and sects from 35 countries.

Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Yona Metzger, also attended the conference, during which he urged Hamas to let a cleric visit abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

"I'm holding in my hands a picture of my brother, a son of my country who was kidnapped. We don't know anything about him. His father and mother aren't receiving any information on him," Rabbi Metzger said.

He urged the religious leaders present "to call for a representative of the abductee's faith to be able to visit him and give him sustenance."

At the annual inter-religious conference last week that was held this year in Kazakhstan, Israel's Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yona Metzger displays a photo of captive Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, urging his colleagues to help secure the release of the soldier who has spent more than three years as a prisoner of Hamas in Gaza. [Flash90 photo]

What if U.S.-Iran talks fail?

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is urging the United States and other countries to start preparing for the possibility that Washington's proposed dialogue with Iran will fail, by having a "Plan B" that includes "paralyzing sanctions" and other measures against Tehran. The United States has so far resisted this idea.

The Israeli messages – sent against the background of the recent unrest in Iran following the elections there – have been delivered to the White House, the State Department and senior officials in the U.S. intelligence community by senior officials in the Israeli Prime Minister's Office and the Foreign Ministry. Similar messages have been sent to senior officials in Germany, Russia, France and Japan.

Israel's argument is that if the Americans are indeed committed to imposing "paralyzing sanctions" on Iran should the dialogue fail, as both U.S. President Barack Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton have said in the past, the work of drafting these sanctions must begin now.

"Israel is adjusting its messages to the new circumstances created by the unrest in Iran," a senior government official said. "These things must be stated clearly now so that there is no confusion about our position."

Bialik Gets Grant

TORONTO — Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto has received a grant from the New York-based Avi Chai Foundation that will let students in grade 7 and 8 use digital filmmaking techniques to show how modern Jewish issues have roots in biblical times. The $10,000 (US) grant is one of 20 given by Avi Chai out of 200 applications to its educational technology grant program, which it started in 2007 to help educators use innovative technological approaches. Founded in 1984 by stockbroker Zalman Bernstein, Avi Chai supports Jewish camps and schools.

Prof Gets Tenure

NEW YORK — A Columbia University professor who reportedly asked an Israeli student how many Palestinians he had killed was given tenure. Columbia approved Joseph Massad's bid for tenure, his second attempt, last month. Massad was part of a controversy several years ago over scholarly treatment of Israel at Columbia. In addition to the comment about killing Palestinians, he was accused of mistreating and intimidating pro-Israel students. He denied many of the claims and said he was the target of a "witch hunt." A university probe substantiated some of the claims against him and found that in one instance, he exceeded "commonly accepted bounds" of behaviour.

Franken Wins Seat

MINNEAPOLIS — Former Saturday Night Live comedian Al Franken, a Jewish Democrat, has won the Minnesota U.S. Senate race after eight months of recounts and legal challenges. In a unanimous decision, the Minnesota Supreme Court ruled June 30 that Franken's 312-vote victory would stand. Republican Norm Coleman, who also is Jewish, then ended his legal battle, officially conceding the race. With Coleman's defeat and the decision by Pennsylvania's Arlen Specter to join the Democratic caucus, the Senate now has no Jewish Republican members. The House of Representatives has one Jewish Republican, Minority Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia.

Court Ends Probe

MADRID — Spain's National Court last week ended its investigation of alleged Israeli war crimes. A judge on the Spanish National Court said in May he would investigate a 2002 Israeli bombing that killed a Hamas leader in Gaza, despite the fact prosecutors advised against it and Israel probed the murder. The decision to end the probe came after Spain's parliament gave preliminary approval to a law saying that cases must involve a Spanish citizen or a defendant on Spanish soil. Previously, the court, under the principal of universal jurisdiction, said it could try rights and war crimes cases if the country of origin doesn't. It has investigated such cases throughout the world.

Rowe Seeks Rights

LOS ANGELES — Michael Jackson's Jewish ex-wife, Debbie Rowe, has asked a court to restore her parental rights to two children she bore him, partly because of the pop icon's links to the Nation of Islam. The pair married in 1996, with both parties saying the sole purpose of the marriage was to give Jackson children. Jackson's mother has temporary custody of the late singer's children.

Fined For Klezmer

BERLIN — A Dresden politician was fined for playing loud klezmer music from his office at City Hall to disturb a neo-Nazi rally. Stephan Kuhn of the Green party was ordered July 1 to pay a $210 (US) fine, which will benefit a group that helps victims of right-wing violence. Neo-Nazis held a march on Feb.13, 2008, on the anniversary of the World War II firebombing of Dresden by the Allies. Prosecutors said Kuhn disrupted a speech, thus interfering with the right to free assembly.

Jewish Groups Won't Oppose Al Jazeera

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish groups have indicated that they won't oppose the carriage of Al Jazeera English on cable and satellite services and that they'll sit on a committee that will review the channel's on-air content.

The news comes after an aggressive campaign to bring Al Jazeera English to Canada, which saw the satellite news network take the unusual step of consulting both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada in February to work through concerns about its programming.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said he hasn't offered an outright endorsement of the service, but said an invitation to sit on a consulting committee helped ease concerns. "We do not oppose [the service], but remain vigilant and concerned," he told JTA.

Similarly, B'nai Brith said in a letter to the CRTC, Canada's broadcast regulator, that "in the spirit of co-operation," it won't oppose the bid, but will remain vigilant.

Tony Burman, a former CBC news executive who is now managing director of Al Jazeera English, based in Doha, Qatar, wants his consultative committee to meet every six months to ensure there are no major concerns.

Jewish groups sounded strong opposition in 2003 when the Arabic-language version of Al Jazeera applied for a broadcast licence in Canada, and fears were raised that the network would beam messages of hate against Jews and Israel into the country. In 2004, the CRTC approved the application, but attached conditions so stringent that cable providers were unable to comply.

Rabbi Kelman remembered as pioneer of inclusion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Joseph Kelman – founding rabbi of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and a pioneer in Jewish community inclusion for people with developmental disabilities – died on June 27 of cancer, following a three-week illness. He was 82.

At his funeral on June 30, the rabbi was remembered as much for his innate goodness, cheerful disposition and optimism as for his achievements at his synagogue and in the community.

Obituary

Among the latter were his involvement in prison and hospital chaplaincy, leadership of interfaith missions to Israel, and founding the Ezra and Kadima Schools, the Kadima Centre, the Camp Tikvah Program, the Reena Foundation, Chai Tikvah and the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School.

An estimated 1,000 mourners – friends, relatives, congregants, Reena clients, Jewish and non-Jewish clergy – filled the sanctuary and its balcony at Beth Emeth to honour the rabbi and hear eulogies from his brother, Rabbi Abraham Kelman; daughter Tova Gutenberg; two sons, rabbis Jay and Maury Kelman; grandson Joshua Gutenberg; colleague Rabbi Erwin Schild of Adath Israel Congregation; and CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, representing the larger Jewish community.

Beth Emeth's Rabbi Howard Morrison, who officiated, referred to Rabbi Kelman as his rabbi, colleague and friend. "And I speak on behalf of thousands."

The congregation's rabbi emeritus gave his heart and soul to his shul, colleagues and the entire community, Rabbi Morrison said.

In November 2008, Beth Emeth honoured Rabbi Kelman for 50 years of service with its Yakir Hakahal (Precious to the Community) award.

Nine months earlier, he was honoured by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for almost five decades of work on behalf of people with special needs.

The rabbi's efforts began in 1960 after a congregant approached him about a bar mitzvah for his developmentally delayed child. The result was Kadimah, a Jewish school for students with developmental disabilities.

Rabbi Kelman later co-founded Ezra, a program for students with learning disabilities; She'arim, a school for children with learning disabilities; and Reena, an organization that integrates adults with developmental disabilities into the community.

As well, he chaired a North America-wide committee on special education under the auspices of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism for more than 30 years, and was instrumental in having developmentally disabled children accepted into Ramah camps.

Among the rabbi's other honours was an honorary doctorate from Tel Aviv University, where the Kelman School for Jewish Education is named for him.

Saying farewell

From the editor's desk...

The sorrow we felt at the shocking, bitter news of the passing on June 27 of Rabbi Joseph Kelman founding rabbi of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, was the difference between saying goodbye to a beloved friend and saying farewell. The finality of farewell is so very hard and difficult, and sometimes even terrifying to accept. And yet accept it we must, for that is the way of all living things in this large and beautiful world that God created for us.

More than most men we will ever meet again, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, of blessed memory, strove with all his considerable energy, goodness, courage and resolve to help us see and believe that the world was indeed large and beautiful for each and every one of us. Where it was not, it was his mission to make it so. Where the world was imperfect for people cast to the side, he strove to make it more perfect, if not entirely perfect, for them.

More than most men we will ever meet again, Rabbi Joseph Kelman embodied in his life the truth that our ancient sages taught: "Who is honoured among individuals? The one who honours God's creations."

As we know, as we saw and experienced countless times in his synagogue and, indeed, wherever he walked, Rabbi Joseph Kelman was always in a rush to honour others. Founding ground-breaking places of learning and belonging such as the Ezra and Kadima Schools, the Kadima Centre, the Camp Tikvah Program, the Reena Foundation, Chai Tikvah and She'arim Hebrew Day School was merely partial proof of that.

He understood instinctively what many of us only learn much later in life: that to honour others is to honour God. For Rabbi Kelman however, honouring others was no mere perfunctory act. It meant reaching toward the very reason for life itself. It meant that no human being was to be without dignity; no one was to be treated unjustly; no life was to be scorned or shunted off to a siding somewhere or hidden in a far-off building not to be seen, or educated, or embraced or caressed as a son or a daughter. He was a true pioneer who, against great odds and often too against established doctrine, blazed a trail into the unlit, darker passageways of our community institutions, opening their doors and their services to the individuals for whom they had always been closed.

More than most men we will ever meet again, Rabbi Joseph Kelman gave tangible meaning to one of the core teachings in the Torah: "ve'ahavta l'rayacha camocha." (Love your neighbour – treat your neighbour – as you would yourself.) He taught us, by his example, that to love someone means to do for someone, to act, to advocate for, to stand alongside with, to aid, to assist, that same someone. He taught us that loving – in the most profound sense of the word – means doing, means taking action. In a very concrete way, Rabbi Kelman explained for us through his principled, generous approach to life what the songwriter in the Broadway play Les Misérables meant when he wrote: "To love another person is to see the face of God."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman 1927 — 2009

More than most men we will ever meet again, Rabbi Kelman judged no Jew by the outward level of his ritual observance. He judged no man by any outward trappings of appearance. He judged human beings only as he wished himself to be judged: by God alone.

One morning, many years ago, a man in his mid-40s, old enough to know more than he did and old enough to know that he should have known more than he did – a recent avel, mourning for his late father – was asked to lead the Shacharit service in the chapel. He walked to the shulchan (table at the front) slowly, with plainly hesitant steps. It was obvious to all of us that he was nervous at the prospect, never having led the davening before. He was unfamiliar with the service, clumsy with Hebrew, and clearly self-conscious.

But he led the davening nevertheless, and, of course, he made many mistakes – mispronouncing, misplacing and misstepping throughout. After the service, he had no sooner unwrapped his tfillin and put away his tallit than Rabbi Kelman bounded over to him, put his right arm around the man's shoulders and said effusively, with his characteristic broad smile, "Kol hakavod! Yasher Koach! Good job!"

Like water to parched earth, his words and positive reinforcement raised the man's self-esteem and confidence. The rabbi's encouragement gave pulse to a newly beating Jewish heart.

It is no exaggeration to say that countless were the times and countless have been the individuals whom Rabbi Joseph Kelman helped in this manner. In one way or another, we have all felt his strong, supportive hand on our shoulder.

More than most men we will ever meet again, Rabbi Joseph Kelman was our teacher, and we revered him as we revere Heaven itself. And that is why, thankful as we are that he was in our lives – as our rabbi and our friend, encouraging us, inspiring us, helping us, teaching us – it is so difficult to say farewell.

We will not soon meet again, nor will our community soon feel again, the unique love and strength and goodness of this man. — MBD

Congress 'perplexed' at lack of hate charges

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress is asking Chris Bentley, the attorney general of Ontario, to review a decision not to prosecute a Toronto man for Internet postings that attack Jews.

"We'd like the attorney general to take a look at the file," said Len Rudner, director of Congress' Ontario region. "Our request for a review is based on demonstrably hateful content."

Early last week, the Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) announced that after investigating Salman Hossain and consulting with Crown lawyers, "it was determined that insufficient grounds existed to support willful promotion of hatred charges."

Len Rudner

Hossain first came to the attention of law enforcement officials almost two years ago after German police arrested three Islamic terrorist suspects. Hossain posted several messages that same day, the National Post reported.

"I hope the German brothers were gonna blow up U.S.-German bases in their country. We should do that here in Canada as well. Kill as many western soldiers as well so that they think twice before entering foreign countries on behalf of their Jew masters," he wrote.

Building on his views of Jews, he stated: "When do I get to shoot a few Jews down for attempting to blow up dozens of mosques in America right after 9-11… Why f—ing target the Americans when the Jews are better?"

Another posting that focuses on Jews stated: "Here's what I suggest we do… just throw out the Jews (by religion or blood) out of the instruments of mainstream media, finance/banking, government/politics, and the intelligence/secret services.

"That's how the Muslims have done it in the past, especially when they were in power and glorious. Leave behind the token Jew here and there just to appear non-discriminatory."

Mark Goldberg, chair of the community relations committee of Congress' Ontario region, said that the "statements alleged to have been made by Salman Hossain appear to reflect a deep hatred of Jews and speak to a mindset that embraces the most corrosive conspiracy theories."

Rudner said Congress is "perplexed" at the decision not to file criminal charges against Hossain. "The contents of his statements on the Internet meet the test" for hatred.

"He looks forward to the opportunity of shooting 'a few Jews' and hopes for the killing of 'western soldiers.' Such statements go beyond offensive and give every appearance of crossing the line into wilful promotion of hatred as defined by the Criminal Code," Rudner said.

Asked whether Congress would contemplate initiating a section 13 complaint under the Canadian Human Rights Act, which makes it an offence to use the Internet to promote hate, Rudner said Congress would prefer to see Hossain prosecuted under the Criminal Code.

A police investigation has already been undertaken and documentation gathered. "I certainly don't see any downside to letting the matter proceed criminally," he said.

If the criminal track doesn't pan out, Congress' legal affairs committee would determine whether to lay a human rights complaint.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO gets new president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After the death of Canadian Hadassah WIZO (CHW) president Terry Shwarzfeld following a beating in Barbados in March, Marla Dan, Toronto president and first vice-president, stepped up to the plate.

"We were all shocked and concerned when we heard the news, but when it became apparent that Terry was not going to recover, we reviewed the governance structure, and I took over" as new president, said Dan.

Marla Dan

She had just entered the national scene as an officer, "but being Toronto president gave me a lot of skills. One of our thrusts is leadership, and I was given good, solid training."

As the new national president, she led the organization on its mission to Israel for Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Hazikaron, and has travelled to Montreal and Vancouver for the local installation of officers.

"I represent Canada, and I am chief cheerleader. I give local officers support when they need it, and I make sure everything is running smoothly. We are all part of one organization, but we respect each city's individuality," she said.

A native of Edmonton, Dan, who is married and the mother of two teenagers, joined the organization 22 years ago as a newcomer to Toronto. "I wanted to meet other women, and I wanted to get involved in the Jewish community," she said. "I joined Tamid chapter when most members were single, and we've gone through our life cycles together."

She has held almost every position in her chapter, as well as a position at World WIZO, and has travelled to Israel as a representative of Aviv Women, the organization's young leadership arm. "About the only job I didn't take on was chair of Hadassah Bazaar.

"CHW is about fundraising, but it is also about camaraderie. I've met women from all over the world," Dan said.

She acknowledges that women today have less time to volunteer than they did a generation ago, "but there are all kinds of ways to volunteer. If everyone gives a little time or a little money, then it all adds up. As a leader, my job is to say thank you for whatever you can give."

The organization has found ways to work around women's schedules, she said. "We have to respect their time, so we make our committees larger, and make sure everyone has lots of help. That is how volunteerism works."

During her three-year term, she aims to "make sure everyone knows what we do, and make us an organization that people want to support," she said.

Canadians to bike in Israel to aid disabled vets

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Feel like helping the disabled veterans of Israel? Then you should consider getting on your bike, finding some sponsors and training for the second annual Courage in Motion ride, sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada: Aid To Disabled Veterans of Israel.

The five-day ride, now in its second year, is scheduled to take place in Israel from Oct. 19 to 23 and will see riders from around the world cycle from Latrun to Eilat – travelling between 40 and 100 kilometres daily, depending on fitness and skill levels.

Last year, Canadian and U.S. riders raised more than $100,000 for the charity, which provides emotional and physical rehabilitation to 51,000 Israeli veterans and victims of terrorism.

In a recent interview, Joni Kwinter, a Beit Halochem board member and co-chair of the ride, told The CJN that she hoped for a bigger rider contingent from Canada this year. She also hoped riders would take advantage of their finish-line destination and "have a good time" in Eilat, adding that the riders will share a Shabbat meal with the city's mayor this year.

She said aside from seeing the beauty of the Israeli countryside, one of the most moving parts of the ride is witnessing some of the Israeli veterans who participate.

"They sometimes tell their stories to others to inspire them," she said, adding that riders are also accompanied by members of the Israeli national racing team, who serve as guides.

Five-day ride scheduled for October

"Friendships do form, too," Kwinter said, noting that as of June, there were 25 riders registered to participate this year.

According to Kwinter, the Canadian arm of Beit Halochem sends about $2 million a year to Israel, making it the charity's "largest funder in the world."

Kwinter said the ride has proven itself "therapeutic" for the disabled veterans, whose families also take part.

"It was remarkable to see their enthusiasm [on last year's ride]. It really gave them a focus."

Benevolent society celebrates its 110th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Toronto Hebrew Benevolent Society, the oldest Jewish mutual benefit society in Ontario, and possibly in Canada, has been serving the needs of its members for more than a century.

The benevolent society recently celebrated its 110th anniversary with a dinner and dance at Beth Torah Synagogue.

The society was founded on Jan. 15, 1899, when some 15 men gathered at 10 Armoury St. in Toronto. Federman's great-grandfather, Morris Spiegel, who emigrated from Hungary, was a founding member of the organization, and Louis Brand was its first president.

Federman's father, Stan, is active with the Toronto Hebrew Benevolent Society (THBS), particularly working with Steeles Memorial Chapel, which was founded by Spiegel. Federman's uncle, Wilfred Ross, a grandson of Spiegel, was the organization's longest-serving president.

Today, the benevolent society has more than 200 members, both men and women, who meet at least four times a year to hear speakers and to discuss philanthropic endeavours. THBS supports many Jewish and non-Jewish charities.

"Throughout the years, we have continued to increase the number of organizations we support both locally and in Israel," Federman said.

"During World War II, we sent comfort boxes to servicemen overseas and supported programs at Camp Borden. We also established five perpetual scholarships at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem."

Before the advent of public health care, the society provided hospital and medical benefits, with doctors on call for its members, Federman said.

"We also have a sick-benefit fund, which provides certain benefits when a member is ill and needs assistance, which is provided strictly confidentially and it is never discussed at any meetings," he said.

THBS provides burial plots for its members and maintains its cemetery properties.

An annual Chanukah party, which the society holds for its members, is a charitable effort. "We also invite non-members, as well as families with children from Jewish Family & Child. Many of them would otherwise find it difficult to provide gifts and entertainment for their children," Federman said.

"We also sponsor an annual picnic, where non-members are invited. This has become a favoured family outing."

Federman said that an important part of benevolent society membership is visiting sick members and attending members' funerals. "We hope that all our members, including new members, will be able to perform this important duty."

He stressed that THBS is not a fundraising organization and that most of the money it raises comes from members' dues. The society has a charity board that carefully researches numerous charities to determine their needs.

THBS supports Beit Halochem, which helps disabled veterans in Israel; the Canadian Cancer Society; the Heart and Stroke Foundation; the Israel Cancer Research Fund; Jewish Family & Child; the United Jewish Appeal; the United Way; hospitals and more.

"We welcome everyone, particularly people who are not affiliated with a synagogue or do not have a cemetery property," Federman said.

For more information about the THBS, visit www.thbs-canada.com or e-mail thbs@rogers.com.

Travesty international

Last week, the human rights organization Amnesty International issued a report on the war late last year in Gaza between Israel and Hamas. The 117-page document is entitled Operation 'Cast Lead': 22 days of death and destruction. The title says it all.

The document, almost in its entirety, targets Israel. Of the six chapters and 117 pages in the report, one chapter – comprising 11 pages – discusses the Palestinians' role in the conflagration.

In a breathtaking dismissive sweep of the hand that typifies the human rights agency's long-standing approach to the predicament of the Jewish state, the report states: "Amnesty International has seen no evidence that rockets were launched from residential houses or buildings [in Gaza] while civilians were in these buildings."

To be sure, Amnesty said that the rocket attacks from Gaza against Israel "constitute war crimes." But this is an easy, non-controversial statement for Amnesty to make, because there can be no denying, either in fact or in law, the plain, simple truth of deliberately launching rockets at men, women and children in their homes, schools, daycare centres and synagogues.

It is clear, however, from the layout, tone, emphasis and weight of the rest of the report that Amnesty only had Israel and the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) in its gun sights.

Amnesty accused the IDF of killing hundreds of unarmed Palestinian civilians, destroying thousands of homes, using civilians, including children, as human shields and of perpetrating random attacks on civilians, of breaching the laws of war and committing war crimes.

The IDF responded to the attack from Amnesty as it does to most attacks against the Jewish state: swiftly and with vigour.

"We find it both questionable and objectionable that a well-respected and ostensibly objective international organization such as Amnesty could produce a report on Operation Cast Lead without properly recognizing the unbearable reality of nine years of incessant and indiscriminate rocket fire on the citizens of Israel. The slant of their report indicates that the organization succumbed to the manipulations of the Hamas terror organization," the IDF said.

The IDF emphasizes a point that Amnesty tends to diminish: "The terrorists' military infrastructure was hidden in and around civilian homes and dispersed to locations scattered around the Gaza Strip, home to an estimated more than 1.4 million people, one of the most densely populated areas on earth."

The war to uproot the terrorists and their infrastructure was justified and necessary. It was, as the IDF said, conducted with great effort "to minimize as much as possible harming uninvolved, noncombatant civilians." But such was the nature of the terrorists' plan, performance and purpose that, despite the best efforts of the IDF, Palestinian civilians were indeed killed – regrettably so, terribly so, but unintentionally so.

Amnesty downplays this critical aspect of the war to the point of dismissing it. Amnesty so unfairly, so determinedly targets Israel that it makes of their report an international travesty.

25 years ago in The CJN

Dr. Seymour Lechman, chair of the New York task force on missionaries and cults of the Jewish Community Relations Council, said missionary cults were targeting not only university students, but Jewish seniors in nursing homes and hospitals. Instead of asking them to renounce Judaism, they suggested that they adapt Christian tenets to their Jewish faith.

The two-state solution (1)

The possibility of a two-state solution, written about in One State, Two States: Resolving the Israel/Palestine Conflict, by Benny Morris, and reviewed by Sheldon Kirshner, is neither bleak nor can it be assumed that this is something the Arabs agree to ("Two-state solution has run its course: Israeli historian," CJN, June 25). It is merely a hope for those who wish to see it. We know through polls that there is a Jewish majority that supports a two-state solution, although many don't. We don't know that the Arabs want it. They express support for it and then negate it by demanding a massive influx of Palestinians into Israel proper through a "right of return." Through the ambiguous Arab formula of two states and a right of return, the Palestinians receive monetary and diplomatic support from the West and appease the many Arabs who want Israel to disappear as a Jewish-majority country.

While U.S. President Barack Obama has strongly pressured Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to declare his support for two states, he has done nothing to pressure the Arabs on their acceptance of Israel as a Jewish-majority state. The West and Jews in general are left to delude themselves that the Arabs will just come around. Maybe they will and maybe they won't. It's not enough reason for Israel to make concessions based on imaginary hopes.

Sheldon Kirshner's review of Benny Morris' new book, One State, Two States: Resolving the Israel/Palestine Conflict, refers to the Arab attempt "by military means to destroy the newly created State of Israel" and goes on to say that "having been defeated in the war, the Palestinians were robbed of the opportunity for self-determination" ("Two-state solution has run its course: Israeli historian," CJN, June 25). Robbed? They started the war, they lost, and yet they were the victims? Come on! Another problem with this review is that nowhere does he tell his readers that Morris was one of the first so-called "new historians," whose sympathies were decidedly pro-Palestinian. For Morris to reach the conclusion that there is no future for the two-state solution is, in itself, more than noteworthy.

Jew-hating Jews (1)

Lawrence Hart does a disservice to CJN readers by equating Jewish criticism of Israeli policies with pathological self-hatred ("Jew-hating Jews," CJN, June 25). This simple-minded formula allows Hart to avoid the issues and declare any criticism of Israel to be based on hatred. The Jewish community would be better served if legitimate criticism were welcomed rather than dismissed, and if Jews were permitted to argue for a better Israel rather than forced to accept whatever policy the current Israeli government finds expedient.

C. Peter Herman

I am of the opinion that self-hating Jews can be pigeonholed into two categories ("Jew-hating Jews," CJN, June 25).

The first group consisting of naive, possibly brainwashed, individuals who are ignorant of the facts and have no attachment to the basis and foundation of their heritage.

...HERE ARE THE COMMON CAUSES OF JEWISH BACK PAIN
1) POOR DAVENING POSTURE
2) CARRYING HEAVY GUILT INCORRECTLY
3) SLIPPED DISC
KRON

The second and more dangerous group is made up of individuals who, subconsciously, feel themselves to be failures in life. Outwardly, they may seem to be accomplished, urbane, even smart. But, in their very beings, they feel unfulfilled, failures. They seek recognition. And they achieve their purpose, albeit subconsciously, by expressing their self-hatred in this fashion, being in the forefront of the verbal and written attacks on Israel. This affords them an audience and particular recognition. They become someone to be reckoned with and receive the attention that they desperately crave. They should be treated as pathetic lost souls, with contempt and disdain.

Yiddish theatre

I would like to congratulate Bryna Wasserman and everyone else who helped organize the Montreal International Yiddish Theatre Festival ("World's Yiddish theatres come to Montreal for festival," CJN, June 25). By all accounts, it was a great success. Yasher koach.

It would have been interesting for your readers to know the genesis of the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre (DWYT). Under the auspices of the then-Jewish People's School, with the assistance of Shimshon Dunsky, and a dedicated group of graduates of the school, Dora formed the Yiddish Drama Group, which is the basis of today's DWYT. Thanks to Dora's dynamism, leadership and perseverance, their goals were achieved. May the DWYT continue to enjoy many more years of well-deserved success.

Tears in the desert:
Darfur crisis continues

By NORMAN L. EPSTEIN

Halima is Zhagawa, an indigenous African tribe in Sudan's Darfur region. She's also a gifted doctor who has attended to victims of the atrocities there. One day, without warning, she was forcibly pulled from her clinic, mercilessly beaten and thrown in jail, where she was repeatedly raped by her sadistic captors. Only by the grace of God did she mange to survive.

Her grievous crimes were twofold: she told a United Nations team about an attack on a girls' primary school, where pupils as young as eight were raped. Her other crime was belonging to a tribe that's been systematically targeted for mass atrocities by the Khartoum regime and its proxy militia, the Janjaweed.

Sadly, not enough tears have been shed by international leaders.

Six years have elapsed since the start of a counter-insurgency campaign in Darfur, orchestrated by the government of Sudan, that has led to the systematic destruction of African life in Darfur, where close to 400,000 people have perished. The true number is not known, as epidemiological studies can only extrapolate the probable mortality. The Khartoum regime prevents unfettered investigations. The statistics include not only death by violence, but death by attrition – famine and disease.

As well, countless others have been raped and tortured, and some 2.5 million people have been forcibly displaced from their homes. Tragically, the international community has been unable to muster the political will to resolve the crisis, and the Sudanese government continues to act with impunity despite recent developments.

In early March, an arrest warrant was issued for Sudanese President Omar Al Bashir by the International Criminal Court for war crimes and crimes against humanity. It was the first time that an international tribunal has charged a sitting head of government with such egregious crimes.

But despite the gravity of the charges, the international community continues to negotiate with Bashir and his cohorts as if they are part of the solution while they continue to be the source of the problem. After Bashir's indictment, the government of Sudan expelled 13 non-governmental humanitarian groups from Darfur that were providing essential services to 1.1 million people out of a vulnerable population of four million. The groups accounted for about 40 per cent of effective health care services and helped to stem infectious diseases such as meningitis and dysentery, as well as implement wide-scale vaccination programs and run multiple feeding centres. The genocide of attrition continues unabated.

Close to 400,000 people have perished

The channels of international diplomacy have only seen a flood of verbiage from world leaders, with barely any action. The international community vacillates on firmer action while the government of Sudan dictates the terms.

For example, the UNAMID security force sanctioned by UN Security Council Resolution 1769 is 1-1/2 years past its due date. Only half the force has been deployed so far. Although resources have not been forthcoming from various countries, the main issue is the Khartoum regime's obstructionism. It ingeniously sets up obstacles, then relents while reinventing other roadblocks to the rapid deployment of this critical force.

The peace process in Doha, Qatar, between the Sudanese government and Darfur rebels has stalled, mostly due to the government of Sudan not honouring earlier agreements, notwithstanding the boycott of the largest rebel group, the Sudanese Liberation Army (SLA), which contends that no serious negotiations can take place until security in the region is assured.

Furthermore, the UN Human Rights Council has deemed the crisis in Darfur to be not suitable for deliberation, which sends the message to the Sudanese government that there are few repercussions for its actions.

It is unfathomable that one of the worst human rights offenders in world does not meet the criteria for examination by this UN body, which only cements the image of the United Nations as a highly dysfunctional organization.

The Arab-dominated government in Khartoum certainly had a sordid human rights record prior to the crisis in Darfur. The longstanding civil war between the regime and African tribes in the south saw close to two million people die, mostly Africans. As well, villages have been razed and five million people were forcibly displaced between 1989 and 2002, using the same brazen tactics that have been employed in Darfur. Much of the conquered land was used for petroleum development. Only when southern rebels regained some of the territory and the rebels held the Khartoum regime to a draw did the government submit to concerted international pressure and sign the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA). However, little of the spirit or detail of the agreement – which clearly stipulates wealth and power-sharing between the north and south – has been implemented. The tenuous agreement is on the brink of unravelling, with this region of Sudan being at risk of another bloodbath. So as Darfur burns, the south percolates.

The odious behaviour of the Sudanese government since it came to power in a coup d'etat in 1989 has at best marginalized and oppressed all African ethnicities (and even a few Arab tribes) and at worst showed pernicious contempt for many African tribes, resulting in their decimation. Much of it this behaviour pre-dated the genocide in Darfur, and the world has been largely oblivious or has taken a laissez faire attitude to what the government has done.

Whether it has been the Dinka and Nuer in the south, the Zhagawa and Fur in the west (Darfur), the Nubians in the centre and the Beja in the east, all have been subjected at one time or another to the brutal wrath and mass atrocities of the regime. Only the atrocities in Darfur have captured international attention, but the regime in Khartoum has escaped unscathed and intact.

It is unconscionable – with all we know about Darfur and the penetrating legacies of genocides of the past century, from Armenia to the Holocaust, culminating in Rwanda – that the world has allowed yet another genocide to linger. The moral compass of the international community seems directionless.

The question remains: what needs to be done?

The government of Sudan has, in effect, vetoed measures to bring peace and security to the region. Benchmarks must be met or punitive measures should be invoked against the regime.

First, the full deployment of UNAMID, with full manpower of 26,000, must be implemented expeditiously to protect civilians in Darfur and permit humanitarian aid to get through. Disarming of both sides must be a clear objective.

Second, the peace process in Doha must address grievances and the marginalization of Darfuris, as well as the repatriation of those who have been forcibly displaced.

Thirdly, the Comprehensive Peace Agreement must be enacted in all its detail, and it must serve as a template that brings peace and security to all regions of Sudan. If these measures are implemented, together with the removal of the indicted Bashir, Sudan can become a credible member of the family of nations once more.

If not, the international community must start to wield a stick.

There must be targeted economic sanctions against individuals and parties that are most responsible for the unmitigated violence in Sudan, including freezing Sudan's assets around the world. Sanctions must be applied where possible to prevent petroleum dollars from reaching government coffers. Much of this revenue is used to purchase weaponry, with little filtering down to the people. Finally, if Sudanese aerial attacks on civilian targets don't cease, a no-fly zone must be enforced.

What can Canada do? It can facilitate this tougher stance by urging its international partners to adopt these measures collectively. Canada has recently demonstrated moral leadership with its boycott of the followup conference to the 2001 UN anti-racism conference, and there is a void of international leadership on the crisis in Darfur.

However, Canadian leadership is contingent on more of us demanding such leadership from our government. We must and can do more!

Halima's story of unbearable suffering, together with countless untold other stories, cannot simply be swept aside in a desert storm.

In the eloquent words of Eli Wiesel: "I swore never to be silent whenever and wherever human beings endure suffering and humiliation. We must always take sides. Neutrality helps the oppressor, never the victim. Silence encourages the tormentor, never the tormented."

Let us continue to torment the tormentor. Our humanity depends on it.

Praying or humming?

We were sitting one Friday evening in the current "in" place of worship in Jerusalem that prides itself of being both Orthodox and egalitarian. The congregation joined in heartily in the singing and the humming.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

At one point in the service, a colleague sitting next to me whispered in Yiddish: "M'lozt nisht davenen [they don't let you pray here]." He had a point.

The niggun – the wordless prayer that was once chassidic and has now become universal – seems to dominate many Jewish worship services. The chant is pushing out the word. The prayers are said quickly and often silently. It seems that you don't need to know how to pray as long as you can hum.

You don't need to know Hebrew, either. Although that's not so in Israel, elsewhere this form of worship eases the pain for those who don't know Judaism's language of prayer. Many say that, had they known Hebrew, they would have attended services more often. But congregations that use English in their services don't attract too many worshippers, either. The niggun seems to be doing much better than the vernacular.

Believing with Heinrich Heine, the German Jewish poet, that Jews pray theology, I'm uncomfortable with the "wordless prayer." Deprived of language, prayer can mean anything. And if it can mean anything, how do I know that it's Jewish?

On the other hand, since Heine's time, the world has also seen the abuse of language. On balance, therefore, the effort to reach Heaven without words may be a wholesome development.

Yet I remain worried, for when we abandon language, we also abandon content and thus sow the seeds of anarchy. What is perceived as warm and fuzzy has only the significance that individuals ascribe to it. That may mean that anything goes, including borrowings from others.

The postmodernism that dominates contemporary thought suspects every structure that offers over-arching answers and demands consistent uniformity. Liturgy has always been a vehicle for the free spirit, even if outer forms had to be observed. Piyutim, poetic prayers that take people beyond the established framework, are an integral part of Jewish worship. Wordless chants may be their contemporary successors.

Also when no words are spoken, denominational differences become less pronounced. The need to reach out to God and pour out one's heart transcends institutions. "Post-denominational" worship services in chassidic/Orthodox garb are coming into fashion.

Each time I feel that my davening is being interrupted and the content of my prayers obscured, I console myself with the thought that this may be a good thing after all.

Too much money?

My new-found freedom as a freelance Jewish educator provides me with a new approach to pluralism.

From the perspective of an organized, democratic and inclusive communal body, it behooved me to show full respect for all constituent communities, groups and denominations. Now, I feel free to criticize with a moderate modicum of disrespect where and when required! Perhaps this is a form of pluralism more people can abide by.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

Of course, other values kick in, and I cannot permit myself a public airing of the various and varied weaknesses of any one denomination or group. The arrogance required and the resulting isolation of putting myself outside the Jewish camp would be intolerable – to me and to others. For one thing, I still belong to a few of these groups.

I do, however, wish to criticize one aspect of contemporary Jewish life that plagues all of us. At a time of economic lows, it is strange to speak of overwhelming affluence, and yet, it might be precisely the right time to consider what 20th- and 21st-century wealth has done to Jewish life.

The most obvious sign of over-wealth has been the ridiculously lavish events that bar and bat mitzvah parties and weddings have become. At a recent 700-guest affair, a friend of mine remembered a British Christian wedding he attended some years back. It consisted of a brief morning service in a country church followed by a wedding breakfast with 30 guests. After a few speeches, everyone went home.

One can guarantee with full certainty that the traditional Sheva Brachot recited at a similarly modest Jewish wedding would be more than acceptable to God, and probably a major relief to family and friends. It would be a major blessing, too, if the rabbis of all denominations had the power to issue some form of sumptuary restrictions on these foolish wastes.

On another occasion, I was talking to a friend who expressed some shock at the idea of a kosher home that did not have two sinks in the kitchen. (There must already be homes with six kitchen sinks. Think meat, dairy and pareve, times two to accommodate Pesach!) Thankfully, my friend's close relative pointed out that their grandparents had fully kosher kitchens with one small sink.

Kashrut at home and in industrial plants has been completely exaggerated by the affluence of Jews who can afford luxuries that have become necessities. Some of the leniencies of meat and milk separation have been neglected because of our ability to have two and three of everything.

Tfillin that are worn in morning prayers are yet another example of the influence of big dollars on what was once affordable to all Jews. It is extremely difficult to find simple, inexpensive tfillin like the first pair I was given when I became a bar mitzvah. The more money, the more hidurim (pious embellishments – nice, but not necessary) we include, and the less available these things become to poor Jews, of whom we have many.

But, are not all of these examples trivial, one-time expenses that only affect very observant Jews? Not entirely. Most Jews still have a Jewish wedding, but there are other, less obvious examples that affect more Jews and will have an influence on the Jewish future. I refer to the institutions of Jewish education: schools and camps. The majority of Jews who use these facilities are demanding more luxurious settings, assuming that the fancier the equipment, the better the education.

In times like these, it is worth reassessing that assumption to determine just what makes a camp or a school a great place of learning. Will my old Camp Massad buddies please come forward to testify that the run-down facility on Black Lake was a place that moulded our Jewish and Zionist characters for life? The more we insist on every hiddur, ritual or educational, the more we restrict Jewish life to those who can afford it.

Even worse, the more we add ostentatious consumption to Jewish life, the less we appreciate the essence of our faith, our values, and our cultural legacy.

Mourning the death of a stranger

We all grieve the passing of someone close to us, someone whose path crossed our own, someone whose influence marked our lives. The death of strangers we note with gravity and sadness, but most often without the same lingering feelings of deep mourning. This layer of distance we feel toward those not part of our inner constellation protects us. Were it not so, we would be unable to bear our daily reading of the newspaper, listening to the radio, or watching news coverage.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

But there are exceptions to this hierarchy of mourning. Sometimes, the death of strangers touches us in profound and unexpected ways, for myriad reasons or for no apparent reason at all. In our culture, the death of celebrities can set off a wave of public grieving for a person whose life seems distant from the lives of those who mourn. The untimely death of Lady Diana, Princess of Wales, for example, caused this kind of widespread expression of grief. More recently, the death of pop star Michael Jackson left people "throughout the world," CNN reports noted, "struggling with their feelings" of loss. Often the lasting power of such public spectacles of grief result from an interplay of spontaneous expression and media construction, authentic feeling and (self-serving) artifice. The strangers whose deaths touch us most deeply reveal something about our aspirations, fears, desires and anxieties.

As it happened, the day the news of Jackson's death broke, I was exchanging e-mails with friends and colleagues about a tragedy that had occurred earlier in the month. As the media filled with retrospectives about the troubled pop star, we were still struggling to come to terms with the brutal killing of a man named Stephen Tyrone Johns, the security guard at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum who was killed in the line of duty. While the pop singer's death was followed by days of tribute, Johns' violent death fell out of public notice within a few days after the attack in the museum that cost the guard his life. Yet his death touched us deeply, and unsettled us.

Of course, Johns wasn't a stranger. He was known well by others who worked at the museum. And like others, I had come to know him over time in the course of frequent visits to the museum for research, conferences, workshops and committee meetings. In the weeks following the terrible shooting at the Holocaust museum, we spoke and wrote of the man we remembered – warm and good-humoured, yet at the same time thoroughly professional and conscientious. Our e-mails were filled with remembered encounters with Johns, as well as concern for his family and outrage at the senselessness of the tragedy.

While Johns was not a stranger to me, he was also not a personal friend. But his death touched me in deep ways. Not long after the shooting, I marked the 41st yahrzeit for my father. I thought of Johns' children and how the loss of a parent will stay with them, shaping their childhood, and even their adulthood. That loss will challenge them, but at the same time, the memory of his heroism can serve to inspire and guide them, to be a blessing.

The attack on the Holocaust museum by a white supremacist had frightening resonances, especially for the Holocaust survivors who serve as docents and were present that day. But the service that cost Johns his life, and the service of his fellow officers, reminds us of the difference between that bleak period of history and our own time – between then and there, and here and now.

The anti-Semitic and racist hatred that fuelled Nazi violence and resulted in the catastrophe of the Holocaust was abetted by both government sanction and the complicity of others. The self-sacrificing courage of Johns at the museum on the Washington Mall serves as a counter-example. The official tribute to him – the closing of the museum for a day to honour his memory, the second closing to accommodate his memorial service – as well as the many visitors to the museum after the shooting are a way to celebrate his spirit, as well as to resist the forces of hatred that, sadly, have been weakened but not yet defeated.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

It's summer and time to read all those books you never got around to despite the best of intentions. The books under review run the gamut from the serious to the sassy and will likely appeal to a wide range of readers.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The seventh edition of Martin Gilbert's The Routledge Atlas of Jewish History (Taylor & Francis) is a great resource. Its 146 captioned maps are a gateway to a whole host of events, from the earliest Jewish migrations in the Middle East to the emancipation of European Jews from the 18th century onward.

In The Other Within: The Marranos (Princeton University Press), Israeli scholar Yirmiyahu Yovel argues that the Marranos – Spanish and Portuguese Jews forced to convert to Christianity in the Middle Ages – were a people apart, rejected by most Jews as renegades and by the majority of Christians as Jews with impure blood. This is a penetrating work.

During the 17th century, Portuguese settlers, some of whom were Marranos, landed in what was then the Spanish colony of Jamaica. Historians believe that 50 to 100 Jewish families gravitated to Port Royal, the island's premiere town, and buried their dead at Hunt's Bay, which is now one of the oldest Jewish cemeteries in the western hemisphere. Marilyn Delevante's The Knell of Parting Day: A History of the Jews of Port Royal and the Hunt's Bay Cemetery (self-published) is an illustrated account of an exotic Jewish community whose members made tremendous contributions to Jamaican society.

Montreal's Baron de Hirsch cemetery, Canada's largest Jewish final resting place, was established to meet the needs of mostly impoverished newcomers. Danny Kucharsky's lucidly written book, Sacred Ground on De La Savane (Vehicule Press), delves into its origins and sheds light on Montreal's Jewish community.

At the start of the 20th century, Yiddish was widely viewed as a corrupt form of German, yet in the Russian empire it was respected and regarded as a medium for literary criticism and a vehicle for science and learning. In The Revolutionary Roots of Modern Yiddish, 1903-1917 (Syracuse University Press), Barry Trachtenberg examines this phenomenon. A companion volume, Adventures in Yiddishland (University of California Press), by Jefferey Shandler, looks at how Yiddish has evolved around the world. Yiddish has affected Jewish humour, and in Shtick Shift (Barricade), Simcha Weinstein presents fresh insights.

Hebrew is a sonorous language, and in Masterpieces of Hebrew Literature (The Jewish Publication Society), edited and with an introduction by Curt Leviant, its richness is revealed in verse and prose across the arc of 2,000 years. The paperback edition of A Fire in their Hearts (Harvard University Press), by Tony Michaels, vividly examines the defining role of the Yiddish socialist movement in the American Jewish experience.

The renowned New York conductor, Leonard Bernstein, is the subject of Barry Seldes' biography, Leonard Bernstein: The Political Life of an American Musician (University of California Press). Seldes demonstrates how Bernstein balanced his career with his interest in progressive politics.

Larry King, the CNN talk show host, bares his rags-to-riches life in My Remarkable Journey (Viking), a breezy autobiography in which he discusses his rise to television stardom and love life (he's been married eight times).

The Middle East is a complex region, and the following books may serve as guides to the perplexed.

Martin Gilbert's The Routledge Historical Atlas of Jerusalem (Taylor & Francis) contains 69 maps and more than 100 photographs and prints, and is an important resource about this much-contested city. Beyond Terror and Martyrdom (Harvard University Press) breaks new ground. Gilles Kepel, a French Mideast expert, meditates on Islamic terrorism, the war on terror, U.S. policy in the Mideast, Israel and the clash of civilizations.

In Egypt After Mubarak (Princeton University Press), Bruce Rutherford thoroughly analyzes the dynamics and personalities of Egyptian politics and the prospects for Egypt once its pro-Western president, Hosni Mubarak, passes on. Iraq teeters on the brink between progress and chaos, and in Iraq: A Political History from Independence to Occupation (Princeton University Press), Adeed Dawisha intelligently explores the trajectory and complexities of its convoluted politics from 1921 to the present.

Canada is home to more than 500,000 Muslims, many of whom are Arabs. In Being Arab (McGill-Queen's University Press), Paul Eid, a Canadian of Arab origin, explains how second-generation Muslim and Christian Arabs negotiate their religious and ethnic identities. He does so by focusing on the experiences of students from five colleges in Montreal. This is an intriguing and challenging study about identity, multiculturalism and prejudice.

The Holocaust burns a hole in the heart, yet it must be studied and re-studied.

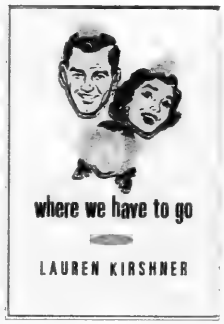
The Minsk Ghetto 1941-1943 (University of California Press), by Barbara Epstein, recounts a little known chapter in the annals of the Holocaust. This meticulously researched book is about the communist-led resistance movement inside the ghetto and its ties with anti-fascist non-Jews. Whereas in the rest of Europe ghettoized Jews were generally left to fend for themselves, the imperilled Jews of Minsk had allies who were willing to help. This fact drives Epstein's compelling story.

During the Nazi occupation of Warsaw, a group of Jews in the ghetto, led by the historian Emanuel Ringelblum, created Oyneg Shabes, an organization that was to document the lives of its oppressed and starving inhabitants. Oyneg Shabes deposited thousands of documents in milk cans and tin boxes and buried them. Samuel Kassow's Who Will Write Our History? (Random House) tells the tragic tale of Ringelblum's attempt to preserve the memory of a doomed population.

The Massacre of the Jews of Lithuania (Gefen), by Karen Sutton, is an accomplished work of scholarship, while Rezso Kasztner: The Daring Rescue of Hungarian Jews by Ladislaus Lob (Pimlico) is a defence of a controversial figure by a man who owes his life to him.

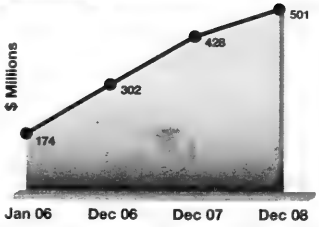
Haunted City: Nuremberg and the Nazi Past (Yale University Press), by Neil Gregor, is a magisterial account of how a German city associated with National Socialist ideology, Nazi party rallies and the staunchly anti-Semitic propagandist Julius Streicher came to terms with the legacy of Nazism.

My daughter the novelist



For far too many years, I have read non-fiction at the expense of fiction. But recently, I read Lauren Kirshner's novel, Where We Have To Go, which was published by McClelland & Stewart last month. As you might have guessed, Lauren is my daughter, my beloved youngest daughter. This piece, therefore, is not a review but a reflection of my profound pride as a father in her accomplishment. At the age of 27, she is a published novelist, and if a laudatory review in Quill and Quire – Canada's premiere literary journal – is anything to go by, Lauren is on her way to becoming a strong new voice in Canadian literature. Where We Have To Go, as told by the sensitive narrator Lucy Bloom, is the story of a dysfunctional Toronto Jewish family torn by turmoil. It is also a luminous coming-of-age tale that unfolds against a tableaux of self-doubt and self-discovery. The characters are compelling and the situations are plausible. It is a poignant novel about angst, disappointment, sorrow, love and personal freedom, leavened by flashes of zany humour and enlivened by magic realism. Well done, Lauren.

The Romspen Fund has Tripled in Size...



Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund Size

Income distribution to investors is on the 15th of every month. The Fund is RRSP and RRIF eligible and is audited by KPMG.

While so many mutual funds have declined in size, the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund has tripled in just over three years. How?

Second, more and more friends and family of investors are purchasing units.
Third, new investors seeking an attractive monthly income have come on board.

Proven, consistent performance – that's why we continue to grow. Come to a New Investor Seminar, meet the management team and learn why the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund should be a trusted and reliable part of your financial plan.

Jewish, Muslim students work together at Mackenzie

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"First you're a human being before you're anything else. That's how I look at it," says Nazir Amir, who recently finished his last year of high school at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute.

Amir – along with fellow graduating students Somayya Saleemi, Alec Levin and Eitan Gilboord – sat around a table in the school's library shortly before completing final exams to talk to The CJN about the harmonious relationship between Mackenzie's Muslim Students Club and its Jewish Culture Club.

Amir, the Muslim group's treasurer and vice-president of public relations for the past year, wonders whether other schools can use Mackenzie's example "as a model... to promote understanding, tolerance and awareness. I definitely think Mackenzie is a shining beacon."

The valedictorian of his graduating class, Amir, like Saleemi, applied from out of the school's geographic catchment area because of Mackenzie's "MaCS" program, which offers enrichment in mathematics, science, computers and English for students in grades 9, 10 and 11.

His parents, refugees from Afghanistan, immigrated from India when he was one year old. He plans to pursue a biomedical degree at York University and, eventually, a career that involves helping others.

Levin, president of the Jewish Culture Club for the past year, described Mackenzie as having "a very constructive environment," in part because of its high academic level and "strong values" of the students.

Neither Amir nor Saleemi had met anyone Jewish before high school, aside from one teacher each, whose classes they had been in when they were in elementary school.

Gilboord, the immediate past president of National Conference of Synagogue Youth's (NCSY) south Toronto chapter, and Levin are both children of Canadian-born Jews who had one Muslim friend growing up – a neighbour to both of them.

"He went to our bar mitzvahs," recalls Gilboord.

"We've all been brought up to be respectful of other people," Levin said.

"The point for us is to strengthen the bond that's here in Canada," said Amir, adding that the clubs avoid politics.

Gilboord said that the Jewish Culture Club doesn't try to "ignore" politics, but focuses on trying to strengthen bonds rather than to break them.

Saleemi said the conflict in Gaza earlier this year "made us realize we should do something to show that we're similar more than we're different."

She told The CJN she became friends with a Jewish girl on her first day at Mackenzie. "She invites me for dinner on Friday. Her mom makes the best hummus... She's pretty religious. I learned a lot from [her]," said Saleemi, 17, who also intends to pursue a biomedical degree at York.

"We can all be friends," said Levin, 18, an athlete and alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools who plans to study life science next year at the University of Toronto.

Gilboord – a 17-year-old who switched to Mackenzie from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto in Grade 11, and plans to study arts at Ryerson University – said that he has spoken to other students on an individual basis about Israel, "but there's no hate speech going on [at Mackenzie]."

Saleemi, who was born in Canada to Pakistani immigrants, was president of the Muslim Students Club for the past two years. She said her club's activities include an annual Hajj seminar to explain the Muslim festival, and Friday prayers followed by discussions that are open to the entire school, where students can ask questions about anything they've heard in the media.

The Muslim club meets weekly and this year attracted about 10 to 12 students. The Jewish Culture Club is larger, with about 40 participants at a time, reflecting the larger number of Jewish students at the school.

Levin said topics of discussion at the Jewish Culture Club's weekly lunchtime sessions have included Jewish holidays and issues, the Holocaust and modern-day genocides, and Israel. NCSY provides pizza and a staff person.

"We also reach out to other students and promote a good environment in the school," Levin said.

Next year's club presidents will "definitely" work together, he added.

The two clubs joined forces twice for the school's Food Days, an opportunity for clubs to raise money either for themselves or for charity.

The first time, they served bagels, lox and cream cheese. On a subsequent occasion, it was samosas, biryani and tacos.

Saleemi said the effort had "a significant impact" within the school. "Everyone – students, teacher – noticed that everyone had collaborated."

It was "a source of pride for the school," Levin said.

extends its deepest condolences to the family of

Rabbi Joseph Kelman ז"ל

Rabbi Kelman dedicated fifty years of rabbinic service toward supporting the spiritual needs of the Jewish people. He served as rabbi of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda for 40 years and continued to serve as rabbi emeritus over the past 10 years.

Our thoughts and prayers are with his family and the community at this time.

May the Almighty comfort all those who mourn his loss along with the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

UJA Federation allocates additional million dollars for vulnerable

New budget also maintains allocations to beneficiary agencies

By Howard English

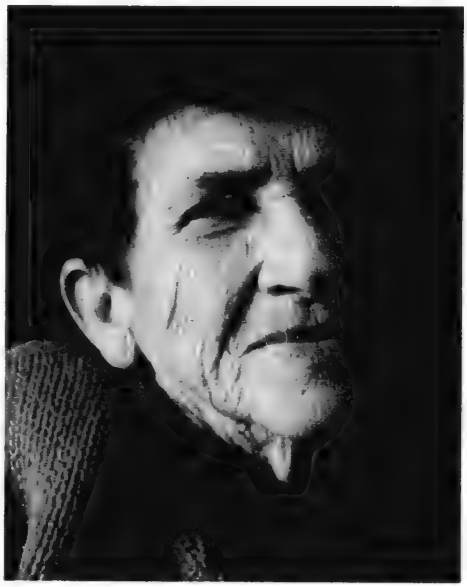
With Canada confronting an economic recession, the new UJA Federation of Greater Toronto budget is focusing on those in danger of being left behind by the downturn.

The organization's financial blueprint recently passed by the Board of Directors allocates an additional one million dollars for the community's most vulnerable, including increased funds for child welfare, supplementary financial assistance for the poor and employment services, more money for counseling, and increased spending to assist victims of domestic abuse.

"We recognize that, in these times of economic turmoil, our most vulnerable have urgent needs and we are urgently required to meet them," said UJA Federation senior vice chair Alan Winer.

The budget also maintains or increases allocations to UJA Federation beneficiary agencies and sets aside $2 million for future needs during this fiscal year that ends on June 30, 2010.

"In order to maintain and even increase our allocations to our partner agencies and schools during these challenging times, Federation worked hard to reduce its internal operating expenses and make available the maximum dollars for distribution," said UJA Federation president & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "Thanks to the leadership of our Board and the great work of our United Jewish Appeal Campaign volunteers, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was one of the very few federations that was not only able to maintain its allocations this year, but actually increase them overall."



UJA Federation's new budget focuses on the vulnerable.

Other budget highlights include:

- An additional $100,000 to support services for seniors
- An increase of more than $500,000 for day school tuition subsidies
- Approximately $600,000 for children with learning disabilities and $400,000 for supplementary school programming
- More than $12.6 million overall for formal Jewish education
- Continuation of UJA Federation's partnership with the southern Israeli region of Eilat-Eilot, designed to transform the area into a centre of higher education, health care and environmental innovation
- A project to help the Ethiopian community of Bat Yam integrate into Israeli society
- More than $930,000 to serve Jewish students on university campuses, which are, increasingly, the focus of troubling incidents
- Additional initiatives to engage Russian and Israeli Canadians
- $200,000 to nurture Jewish identity among 25 to 35 year-olds

The 2009-2010 budget is based on this year's annual campaign results, which is expected to reach $65 million, and Winer is confident about the new campaign as well.

"We approach this challenge with confidence that UJA Campaign 2010 is going to be strong and reflect our community's incredible compassion and generosity," he said.

Former She'arim students thrive in first year of special program

By Daniel Horowitz

After Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School decided to close a year ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto began discussions with three schools - Associated Hebrew Schools, Netivot HaTorah and TanenbaumCHAT - about setting up a special program to meet the ongoing unique needs of She'arim students.

All three agreed.

Associated took students who were going into Grades 3 to 6; Netivot took care of Grade 7 students, while TanenbaumCHAT established a special Grade 8 program.

The former She'arim kids at each school are educated in a separate program with additional support. UJA Federation financing of this program costs approximately $600,000 per year.

One year later and judging by 13-year-old Leora Newman, the first TanenbaumCHAT Grade 8 valedictorian, it's money well spent.

"TanenbaumCHAT has been amazing," says Leora. "First of all, we had a different teacher for every subject and the small class sizes and the individual attention really helped me. I started developing more confidence in my abilities and I feel ready now for high school. I never thought I'd be standing up on the stage giving a valedictorian speech, but I did and I am so honoured and happy."

"I can't say enough about what TanenbaumCHAT has done for my daughter," says Leora's proud mother, Roberta. "Leora has made tremendous progress in the last year thanks to the dedication of the teachers and staff. All the parents were so relieved and excited when UJA Federation, TanenbaumCHAT, Netivot HaTorah and Associated stepped up. They made a commitment to our children and they have honoured that commitment."

Roberta and Marvin Newman beam as their daughter Leora was named the first valedictorian of the special Grade 8 program for former She'arim students at TanenbaumCHAT's Wallenberg Campus.

Eleven-year-old Ilan Eklove started his Jewish education at Netivot HaTorah before it became clear to his parents that the school was just not a good fit for their son. They moved him to She'arim, and this past school year, he attended the special Grade 5 program at Associated on Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill.

"It's critical that the community understands that approximately 10 percent of all children have a learning disability of one degree or another," says Ilan's mother, Susan, who is also a special education teacher. "The community has a responsibility to have places like this for these kids so that they don't simply fall between the cracks in the system. These special programs at Associated, Netivot and TanenbaumCHAT have given these kids such wonderful opportunities. They have great, state-of-the-art facilities, knowledgeable teachers and principals and our children have the opportunity to integrate with the school's other students both educationally and socially. It's a win-win situation."

At a special ceremony celebrating the end of Grade 5, Ilan Eklove was one of four recipients of a specially commissioned award recognizing personal growth and self-improvement.

"I can't explain the feelings of pride and joy that we felt when they announced Ilan's name," says an emotional Susan. "He got so much out of his year at Associated. He is totally flourishing now, with an increase in confidence and skills, and he made so many new friends as a result of the special program. Remember, we are parents who are committed to giving our kids a Jewish education, and it's my hope that, after next year, they'll be able to continue their Jewish education and all that it offers."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Moroccan-U.S. relations are special

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

A rather intriguing and elaborate-looking letter sat one day on the desk of George Washington, 12 years before he became the first president of the independent American republic. The letter presented a pressing problem: it was in Arabic and there was no one around at the time able to read it and interpret its contents. The year was 1777.

Finally, one man, a Jew, was found in New York who could translate the letter's contents. It was a congratulatory letter from the people of Morocco to the 13 colonies, welcoming them warmly into the community of nations. The letter was not only the first-ever recognition of the colonies as a separate, independent entity, it also went on to clearly announce thedesire for a relationship of friendship with the United States. The letter was signed with the royal seal of Sidi Mohammed Ben Abdullah of the Barbary Coast.

When Washington finally became president, he lost no time in responding. The people of the American republic, he said, humbly accept the good wishes of the people of North Africa. He reciprocated with wishes for peaceful and friendly relations. He went on to say that the United States of America was most interested in purchasing a parcel of land upon which an embassy compound could be built. Would the sultan be able to advise as to a suitable location for this endeavour?

In this amazing exchange, Morocco became the first country in the world to recognize American sovereignty, and the first parcel of American consular land in the world was purchased in Morocco.

Piracy and the Barbary Coast are almost synonymous, and in his original letter, the sultan proclaimed that any vessels bearing the American flag would enjoy freedom of passage and could dock at will along the coast and refresh themselves.

When the present King of Morocco visited America for the first time, then-U.S. president Bill Clinton, in welcoming the king, acknowledged all of the above, as well as the continuing friendly relations between the two countries, relations that span more than two centuries.

It need not be said, of course, that the Moroccan government has always been progressive and open. It is pro-western while maintaining its own relations with other Arab nations. Its Jews had, and continue to have, all rights and privileges.

The fact that one of its prominent ministers today is Jewish, as well as the fact that the administration of the United States will be appointing a Jew as its ambassador to Morocco, both attest to the uniqueness of Morocco.

One prays that the new generation of Moroccans will continue in this way and not fall into the abyss of ignorance and prejudice now seen in Arab and European media.

Preparing for September

ON CAMPUS
By Justin Dahan

The international spotlight has been pointed directly at Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu since last month's speech in which he said, among other things, that for Israel to accept a demilitarized Palestinian state, Palestinians must first recognize Israel as a Jewish state, a statement that, of course, did not please U.S. President Barack Obama.

Netanyahu made his position very clear, and it's a position that many Jewish people agree with, but only a few have the gall to say in public.

On the other side of the world, in gearing up for next year, Jewish organizations on campus are turning the spotlight away from politics, and instead working on creating a welcoming atmosphere for Jewish students for the next school semester. It's not that politics are unimportant, but for these groups, the first priority is to provide a positive environment for Jewish student participation.

Instead of focusing on the news in the mainstream media, these organizations are adhering to their roots. With this in mind, Chabad Ottawa, for example, has already planned numerous events for September and even a few for October. Adam Berktin, president of the Chabad Student Network of Ottawa, has worked tirelessly to send Facebook invitations to these events to as many Jewish students as he can.

One of the main attractions Chabad has planned for Ottawa puts a small twist on a tradition they have established – providing a home for Jewish students every week to enjoy the Shabbat spirit. This event has never had as much recognition as it is currently enjoying, since Rabbi Chaim Boyarsky is bringing chassidic rapper Matisyahu to join Ottawa students and Chabad at a Shabbat dinner this month.

Matisyahu is coming to Ottawa to perform in the Cisco Ottawa Bluesfest, an annual summertime festival featuring international artists from various genres. He will perform on Saturday, July 11, at 9:30 p.m. – after Shabbat, of course.

During Bluesfest, Matisyahu will have his usual Jewish following, but along with those who are familiar with him, he will also get to present himself to a new demographic: a crowd that has likely never heard of him. He will be given an opportunity to represent the Jewish community. With the current mainstream media portrayal of Jewish people including protests and other negative activities, Matisyahu will have to face a crowd that may start off hostile, and he will be forced to deal with the daunting task of changing their opinion of him and the people he represents. Through his songs, he preaches about Judaism and about spreading the Jewish way of life. Matisyahu will be given the opportunity to educate those who have been misled about Jewish people. We need to raise more awareness of Judaism, and Matisyahu will have a chance to speak to the masses and do this.

Aside from the Matisyahu event, Chabad, like Berktin, has been working tirelessly to get its schedule for next year prepared. Berktin has received warm reviews from those who have seen the list of events in his e-mails.

As difficult as it is to make a schedule so far in advance, he has not disappointed. Students who don't attend events will not be able to say they didn't have enough notice, nor will they be able to say they didn't know about activities. For this, all of Chabad should receive kudos.

Jewish Life

We need to bring camp home

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

School is out for the summer, and for thousands of Jewish youth, that means that they (or their parents) have been packing duffel bags and heading off to camp. The last decade has seen remarkable growth in Jewish summer camping. Bunks have filled up, new specialty camps have been created, and significant research has been undertaken to study the phenomenon. Camping has shifted from a place of perceived recreation to being a cornerstone of a holistic Jewish education.

But what is it that creates the magic of a Jewish camp?

Camp is an intense 24/7 adventure in Jewish living. Prayers, meals, songs, Shabbat, Hebrew language, social action, Israel and so much more are wrapped into each day and form a uniquely Jewish atmosphere. The breadth of the experience is one that can't be replicated at day schools or synagogues. It's unique to an environment where the kids wake up, eat, play and pray together.

Camp is camp, and it is distinctly not home. Campers feel a sense of freedom at camp to experiment with new experiences. I've worked with campers who try keeping kosher or Shabbat for the first time, who experiment with new forms of prayer or who try to immerse themselves in Hebrew. Camps purposefully isolate themselves not only from parents and the news, but also from the other realities of the outside world. In this isolated community, campers and counsellors can reinvent the norms of life and Jewish living.

Camp creates a unique culture that's bolstered by the sense of community. When counsellors and campers call the dining hall the chadar ochel or sing Birkat Hamazon together, they're asserting a form of peer pressure that's part of the process of acculturation into the camp community. The language they use, the songs they sing and even the clothing they wear form part of the Jewish culture that permeates every aspect of the experience.

At camp, role models abound. Counsellors and unit heads, specialists and camp directors serve as "cool" models of active Jewish living. The relationship built between camper and counsellor is unique and is a direct result of the intensity of the experience. When else does a student live in the same room and eat at the same table as their educator for four, six or eight weeks? Many of my friends, years after leaving camp, are still in touch with their counsellors.

Camp is fun. It seems that after one summer, many campers are hooked. They return year after year and have trouble imagining life without camp.

Notwithstanding the magic of camp, the experience poses a troubling educational framework. A story is told of a camper who loved Havdalah at camp. Each week he would write home to his parents and describe with wonder the experience of the entire camp gathering together in a circle, arm in arm under the stars, while they sway and sing the words of Havdalah.

When he returned home, his mother went out and bought spices, a candle and some grape juice. On Saturday night, when the stars were out, she turned to her son and said, "Come, let's make Havdalah." The boy looked around and said, "Havdalah? How can we do it without a lake, guitar and all the campers and counsellors?"

The educational experience of camp is, in many ways, unparalleled. The challenge we must face, however, is to extend that experience through the other 10 months of the year.

In only a few weeks, camp will end and the campers will return home. It's important that we help them see the intense experience of 24/7 Jewish communal living as being transferable from the isolation of camp back into their homes and their everyday lives.

18th Maccabiah Games, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at the world's premier Jewish sporting event, the Maccabiah Games, which begins July 12 in Israel.

It's no surprise that there will be delegations from the United States, Canada, France and Australia. But according to the Maccabiah site, there will also be Jewish missions representing Grenada, Puerto Rico, India and Thailand – approximately 60 countries in total. And they will be competing in a huge variety of sports, some familiar to the Olympic community: swimming, sailing and triathlon; and others not: 10-pin bowling, chess and footsal, a type of indoor soccer. [tinyurl.com/maccab22]

The official Maccabiah 18 site gives a good overview of this year's games in English, Hebrew and Spanish. [tinyurl.com/maccab14] On the home page of the site, there's a media player with selected clips about past games. Intriguingly, one of the tabs is labelled "Live," which implies that we'll be able to watch some coverage of the games as they unfold. [tinyurl.com/maccab13]

You can view a lovely film highlighting the American delegation's visit to Israel for the 17th games in 2005. Watch for a short clip of Mark Spitz, Olympic champion and Maccabiah veteran of the 1965 and '69 games. [tinyurl.com/maccab24] As well, there's an inspiring promotional video for this year's games. [tinyurl.com/maccab16]

Mark Spitz isn't the only Maccabiah veteran who also brought home Olympics medals. Other famous names include judoka Arik Ze'evi, who won bronze for Israel in the 2004 Olympic Games in Athens; American swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg, three-time Olympic gold-medal winner at the 2000 Games in Sydney, and windsurfer Gal Fridman, who won Israel's first Olympic gold medal at the Beijing Games in 2008. One of the athletes to watch this year is U.S. swimmer and five-time Olympic medallist Jason Lezak. Lezak scored two golds in Beijing as a member of relay teams that included Michael Phelps. This summer, Lezak is forgoing his chance to compete in the world championships so that he can swim at the Maccabiah. [tinyurl.com/maccab17]

The Maccabiah is known as the Jewish games and is open to Jewish athletes from around the world. However, the competition also welcomes all Israeli citizens regardless of religion. In 2005, Asala Shahada, an Israeli Arab teenage girl from the town of Sakhnin, won gold in the women's 200-metre breaststroke. "The Maccabiah belongs not only to all the Jews, but also to all the Israelis, and I am a proud Israeli," Shahada said. [tinyurl.com/maccab18] Those sentiments were not universal. An Israeli Arab dance group cancelled its participation in the same games. According to the group's manager, Widad Atalla, "It is a Jewish endeavour; it is not connected to Arabs." [tinyurl.com/maccab19]

People attend the Maccabiah games for all sorts of reasons. In 2001, Denver's Todd Schayes came as a player-coach, but it seems he was interested in more than just basketball. During the televised opening ceremonies, the 36-year-old athlete held up a sign that read: "Single male. American. Looking for Israeli wife. Contact Todd Schayes at the Tel Aviv Hilton." And more than 4,500 women did. Unfortunately, none of them seemed to be his bashert. Although the New York Times did report about one Israeli Yiddishe mamma with more than a bit of chutzpah. She called "and said she has a son, not a daughter, and asked if Todd would give her his list when he had finished so she could find a bride for her boy." [tinyurl.com/maccab20]

Fortunately for Schayes, the story didn't end there. Back in the States, Elaine Housman of Kent, Conn., was reading about the athlete and his exploits in her local Jewish paper. "I screamed, 'I have found the man for Diane!'" Housman wrote Schayes to tell him about her 30-year-old niece, Diane Lipner. As reported in the New York Times, Todd and Diane's e-mail relationship developed into a full-blown courtship and culminated in their 2003 wedding. [tinyurl.com/maccab21]

Although Schayes' quest started in front of TV cameras at the Maccabiah games in Israel, his relatives say he really doesn't seek the limelight. "He's very low key, very mellow," said Jon Housman, a cousin of the bride. "He told me: 'I'm not a hopeless romantic. I'm a hopeful romantic.'"

One-state solution: another way to eliminate Israel?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Efforts to delegitimize Israel continue to run amok: UN anti-racism conferences used as forums to single out and vilify Israelis in racist terms; Israeli Apartheid Week as an annual Israel hate-fest on various campuses; Canadian Union of Public Employees (Ontario) and other Canadian unions and organizations working feverishly to isolate Israel through boycott and sanctions campaigns, and more.

Into this inimical atmosphere stepped the organizers of a "one-state solution" conference held recently at York University under the more academic title, Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace.

In "What's discussed openly in Israel is toxic in Toronto" (Toronto Star, June 23), Haroon Siddiqui strung together a number of quotes from conference organizers and participants, making it appear that the conference was a balanced, academic exercise, carried out in a climate of open, tolerant discussion and debate. Siddiqui wrote: "The dialogue was civil, [Prof. Sharryn] Aiken [one of the organizers] reported from the meeting, which was closed to the media."

That assessment came as surprising news to a number of those in attendance including one of the Israeli academic participants, Na'ama Carmi from Haifa University.

In "Middle East conference anything but academic" (TheStar.com, June 30), Carmi presented a very different picture, explaining that the dialogue was anything but "civil."

Carmi, who belongs to the left in Israel, opposed banning the conference, even though she feared it might be hijacked to become yet another anti-Israel event. Still, she wanted to participate in order to bring "another voice." What she discovered, however, only confirmed her initial fear.

As she put it: "Not in my worst dreams did I imagine an atmosphere that was totally incompatible with academic discourse... A hostile atmosphere toward people with different views generally, and Jewish-Zionist Israelis in particular, was created. Anyone who challenged the Palestinian perspective was intimidated or even labelled a racist. The audience vocally applauded those whose views it approved. At times, those presenting a different view were subject to abuse and ridicule [her own 'psychological state' was questioned]... And all of this without any apparent attempt by the organizers to stop it."

Carmi concluded, "This was not an academic conference, but an 'academic' version of Durban."

This, of course, could readily have been anticipated by a glance at the program. By inviting a number of prominent anti-Israel political polemicists as participants, the conference organizers could not conceal the fact that they were apparently less interested in real scholarly debate than in promoting a political agenda.

As the conference began, Stephen Scheinberg and Neil Caplan, two Canadian academics affiliated with Canadian Friends of Peace Now, wrote an op-ed in the National Post titled "One state is no solution" (June 23). With historical perspective about why a two-state solution is the only viable option for conflict resolution, they argued: "Current calls for a one-state solution mask a desire for the disappearance of Israel as a Jewish state. They not only reinforce the demands of fundamentalist groups like Hamas, but also cater to demagogic seekers of 'justice' and anti-Israel campus groups."

Today, these "demogogic seekers" pass themselves off in some media circles as "progressives," whereas they represent the height of intolerance. Their position amounts to the following: "A state for the Palestinian people? But of course. A state for the Jewish people? How dare you!"

They well know that a "bi-national" state for Jews and Palestinians from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River would, because of demographics, quickly become another Arab-majority state in which the Jewish minority would be at risk. But this is the very idea: to eliminate Israel as a "progressive" step.

Kehila program director plans move to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shlomo Beldeb, program director at Sephardic Kehila Centre, says he has made major life changes about every 10 years.

"I left Morocco with my family when I was nine, I was in school here for 10 years, I worked in my family's furniture business for just over 10 years, and I've worked at Sephardic Kehila Centre for 12 years."

Also secretary to chief Rabbi Haham Amram Assayag, Beldeb said he began working at the centre when the building was brand new. He was married the day it opened in September 1997.

A program for last month's dinner to honour the Beldebs, said that "whether they were preparing our sons and daughters for b'nei mitzvot, leading youth Shabbatons or organizing countless programs, [they] were a guiding force for our growing kehila.

"Shlomo could lead a choir, a Kehila tour or a group through Morocco, always with a smile on his face. Equally as busy, Elizabeth devoted herself to many causes, including Ezrat Achim, [an organization that feeds families for Shabbat] and the Mikveh Ma'ayan."

Beldeb, who is leaving with his family on a Nefesh b'Nefesh flight this summer, said it was always in their minds to make aliyah, "but we felt we had a mission. The job was meaningful and we'll certainly miss it here, but our kids [ages 11, nine, seven and four] are getting older, and we want to move before it gets harder for them."

He feels that every family is destined to move to Israel. "It is a matter of whether it is us or our children. It is a question of who will make the sacrifice.

"Too many people push the move back and back, and then, ironically, they are buried in Israel. The longer you wait, the harder it gets."

Moving to Israel is part of a Jew's journey, he said.

"When we were slaves in Egypt we were strong and united because others were against us. Then we spread out to the whole world, and our purpose was to spread God's name.

Elizabeth and Shlomo Beldeb

"Now, the whole world knows who the Jews are, and so it is time to move back to Israel. It is our final destination, and by moving there, I am doing my part."

The family is looking at their move as an adventure, he said. "I'll try to find the same type of work when we get there, and my wife will continue working in the same industry. The kids are all excited."

He is not at all worried about his family's safety in Israel, he said. "The world is like a mask; who you think is not safe is safe, and who you think is safe may not be."

Veterans thrilled by reversal on Allied benefits

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Elderly Soviet Jewish veterans of World War II who gathered at the YM-YWHA for a commemoration of the 65th anniversary of the Battle of the Crimea on June 26 received some excellent news.

Mark Groysberg, president of a Montreal organization of the World War II Russian-speaking veterans, told them that they and their families are now eligible for benefits from the Canadian government.

Amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act extending benefits to all needy Allied veterans received Royal Assent on June 18, reversing a change to the law 14 years ago. The bill received the unanimous support of all parties.

In 1995, the Chrétien government amended the same act so that Allied veterans who moved to Canada after World War II were no longer eligible to apply for benefits.

Under the new changes, low-income Allied veterans of World War II (and the Korean War), who have lived in Canada for at least 10 years and live here now, may once again apply.

They are eligible for the guaranteed monthly war veterans allowance, as well as health benefits such as prescription drugs and dental care, services intended to allow veterans to remain in their own home, long-term care in an institution and funeral subsidies, the same benefits available to veterans of the Canadian forces.

Although implementation is scheduled for next January, eligible veterans and their relatives may receive payment for benefits back to Oct. 14, 2008, when the bill was passed by Parliament.

The amount of the benefits is based on such factors as location and duration of military service, health of the veteran and income. Spouses or common-law partners, or survivors, are also eligible to apply, and dependent children may also be considered.

The former Soviet Union is one of 32 countries that were allied with Britain during World War II that are listed by Veterans Affairs Canada.

The news is especially significant to the nearly 100 members of Groysberg's association, the vast majority of whom are Jewish. Jews had a high rate of service in the Soviet military. Groyberg said upward of 500,000 Jews are believed to have served in the Red Army alone, and many emigrated to Canada after the collapse of the Soviet Union. They receive no benefits from their former country, Groysberg said.

Groysberg is not a veteran himself and was born after the war, but his parents and father-in-law served in the Soviet war effort. He is a well-known leader in the Russian Jewish community in Montreal and publisher of the Russian-language Voice of the Community newspaper.

For the past five years, he has been lobbying the federal government to change the law to once again extend veterans' benefits to all Allied servicemen and women living here.

The members of the organization are now very elderly, most in their late 80s and 90s, Groysberg said, but are thankful.

Groysberg sent a letter to Thompson expressing gratitude on behalf of the organization.

"Although the Russian-speaking veterans had never served in the Canadian army, they had fought in an army that was Canada's ally, against the common enemy," he wrote.

"That is why, as Canadian citizens, they have the right to obtain the same privileges as the rest of Canadians."

The Crimean battle, between April 8, 1944 and May 12, 1944, was a series of offensives by the Red Army to liberate Crimea, a peninsula in the Black Sea, from German occupation.

New kashrut body created for bakery

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Last September, Winnipeg's Vaad Ha'ir's sold its roughly 100 kosher licensees – mostly manufacturers of packaged foods – to Rabbi Dovid Jenkins and his New Jersey-based Global Kosher organization and essentially ended its kashrut supervisory activities.

Although the changeover went smoothly for the most part, one very important Jewish community institution, Gunn's Bakery – the only source of locally made kosher pastry – was left in a form of kashrut limbo.

It was still considered kosher, but not under the supervision of the new Winnipeg supervisory body and its WK hechsher – short for Western Kosher (formerly Winnipeg Kosher). Sources tell The CJN that the new WK didn't want to supervise the few remaining non-factory institutions and food outlets that only serve the local Jewish community.

As of June 1, Gunn's kashrut situation has been resolved with the creation of a new kashrut authority specifically for the bakery, the Vaad Hakashrut of Winnipeg. Its supervising rabbi is Rabbi Ari Ellis, who is in his first year as spiritual leader of the Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue, the city's largest Orthodox congregation.

Rabbi Ellis said that WK staff will also serve as mashgichim for the new Vaad Hakashrut of Winnipeg and that Gunn's products will remain acceptable in institutions that are under WK supervision.

"OU policy is not to get involved in supervising local services. They prefer to leave that to local rabbis," said Rick Stokoloff, office manager for Western Kosher, which is affiliated with the Orthodox Union's OU hechsher.

Gunn's, located in north Winnipeg, has been supplying Winnipeggers with kosher bread, baked goods and pastries for 72 years. As the only bakery in the city that makes kosher pastries, it supplies individual customers as well as shuls and hotels that cater Jewish simchahs. (City Bread, Winnipeg's only other kosher bakery, is considered a factory. It ships its products across Canada and doesn't make pastries.)

It was reported at the time of the changeover that the new Western Kosher would not directly certify Gunn's because the bakery, with its mix of pareve and dairy products, didn't conform to the higher standards of the new hechsher.

On the other hand, the bakery's products were still to be considered kosher, and Rabbi Gabe Brojges, WK's Winnipeg-based rabbinic administrator, would continue to inspect the bakery. Gunn's products would also continue to be acceptable for catering purposes.

"There were two factors at work here," Rabbi Ellis said. "Originally, Rabbi Jenkins [who is affiliated with the OU hechsher] would just be acquiring WK's national factory accounts and not become involved with the local kashrut providers. It didn't work out that way."

The other factor, Rabbi Ellis refers to, is the problem of striving for one kashrut standard for North America.

"In Israel," said the rabbi, who had been studying in Israel for 10 years before coming to Winnipeg last summer, "there are three levels of kashrut. Some communities are stricter than others. While I'm not critical of the stricter standard in North America, it leaves no room for some leeway where it might be appropriate."

Rabbi Ellis said that Gunn's is redoing its packaging to include a new Vaad Hakashrut of Winnipeg logo. Everything will be clearly marked either "dairy" or "pareve," he said.

"We are trying to increase the separation between dairy and pareve production and products," he says. "It has never been an issue of Gunn's ingredients and products not being kosher. The issue was making sure there was no mixing of dairy and pareve products."

Rabbi Ellis doesn't see a problem with Gunn's being open on Shabbat.

"We can deal with that the same way that we deal with chametz before Pesach," he said, referring to the practice on that holiday of Jews not owning non-Pesachdik food and dishes by selling them to non-Jews for the duration of the chag, adding that there could be some form of profit-sharing with non-Jewish employees.

"It was important to us to have a rabbi in Winnipeg we could call on whenever we have questions about kashrut," Fivie Gunn says. "We've had to change a few things but we are prepared to do what we are asked to do.

"As far as we're concerned, it's business as usual."

Shul to perform same-sex commitment ceremonies

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's oldest and largest congregation, is going to be performing same-sex commitment ceremonies as of Jan. 1, 2010.

"We are hoping that some gay couples will take advantage of our new policy," said Rabbi Alan Green, senior rabbi of the Conservative shul.

"This is the culmination of a three-year process," he said. "We wanted to do this step by step. In 2008, we began by explicitly selling joint burial plots in our cemetery to openly gay couples. This year, we began accepting gay couples as family memberships, rather than just as individuals. Conducting [same-sex commitment] ceremonies is the last step."

Rabbi Green, however, said he is not expecting same-sex couples to bust down the doors in a stampede for commitment ceremonies.

The Shaarey Zedek, which has a membership of 1,100, may well be the first Conservative congregation in Canada to begin performing same-sex commitment ceremonies.

Rabbi Green said that the Conservative movement's stand on homosexuality remains ambiguous.

In December 2006, the movement's legal authority, the committee on Jewish law and standards, endorsed three opinions on the question of homosexuality. Two upheld the movement's traditional stance barring gay clergy and commitment ceremonies, while a third opened the door to gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies, according to a JTA report.

"In the end, the decision [on whether to perform commitment ceremonies] has been left to the discretion of individual congregations," Rabbi Green said.

In 1999, Winnipeg's Temple Shalom, under the leadership of Rabbi Michael Levinson, began conducting same-sex marriages. The late Rabbi Levinson left the small Reform temple, which has about 120 member families, seven years ago. The congregation was without a permanent rabbi until last summer.

> 'We are hoping that some gay couples will take advantage of our new policy'

Judith Huebner, a past president of Temple Shalom, said that the congregation's new spiritual leader, Rabbi Karen Soria, has officiated at numerous same-sex wedding services over the past year. Many of the couples were not affiliated with the congregation, Huebner said.

Rabbi Green said that Rabbi David Mivasair in Vancouver conducts commitment ceremonies. Rabbi Mivasair, who on his website identifies himself as a Progressive, is the spiritual leader of Vancouver's Ahavat Olam congregation and Seattle's Eitz Or. Or Shalom Congregation, which identifies itself as a Renewal congregation in Vancouver, conducts commitment ceremonies in cases where both individuals are Jewish.

While Shaarey Zedek's commitment ceremony will be modelled after the traditional marriage ceremony, there will be a difference, Rabbi Green said. "The concept of kiddushin in the traditional marriage ceremony sanctifies the marriage between a man and a woman," he explained. For same-sex ceremonies, he will be using the term, "brit" – or "covenant" – rather than "kiddushin."

Rabbi Green said that there will be some traditionalists in his congregation who will not be in favour of same-sex commitment ceremonies performed by their rabbis, but he believes that the vast majority of the congregation will support the new policy.

"It is a matter of fairness," he said. "Besides, the more traditional members of the congregation will only be exposed to a [same-sex commitment] ceremony if they are in attendance at the ceremony."

Elliott Leven, a Jewish gay activist, said the Shaarey Zedek's decision to allow same-sex commitment ceremonies is a "pleasant surprise."

"That's very good news. I have been writing letters to the Shaarey Zedek for the last couple of years, asking them about their position on this issue, but I never got a reply," Leven said.

"I hope that other congregations follow the Shaarey Zedek's lead."

Winnipeg community to honour senior rabbi

> Spiritual leader has long-time connection with Toronto shul

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Peretz Weizman has played a major role in the religious life of Winnipeg's Jewish community for more than 50 years.

The now 86-year-old rabbi has officiated at countless bar mitzvahs, weddings, conversions, gets and funerals, as well as overseeing kashrut in the community for many years.

Ahead of his move to Toronto this fall, the community will be honouring him with a dinner on Aug. 23, which organizers hope will attract as many as 400 people. The organizers hope to raise $100,000 from the dinner to establish the Rabbi Peretz Weizman Holocaust Education Fund, to create a permanent display at the new Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada Corridor Museum as a lasting legacy and a living memorial history of the Holocaust.

Rabbi Peretz Weizman

He decided to move to Toronto because his wife, Reva, who is in poor health, is a resident of Baycrest. She had been a resident of the Sharon Home, the community's north Winnipeg Jewish nursing home. Last fall, the Sharon Home board opened an expanded south Winnipeg seniors residence and closed the north Winnipeg branch. Rather than have Reva relocated to the south Winnipeg residence, her family decided to move her to Baycrest. Over the past year, Rabbi Weizman has been commuting between Winnipeg and Toronto.

Last month, Rabbi Weizman was honoured on a smaller scale by the Chavurat Tefilah Synagogue, with which he has been affiliated for the past seven years. At the May 31 event, the north Winnipeg Orthodox synagogue dedicated its annual tea to the rabbi, and the shul has ordered a new Torah mantle with his name inscribed on it.

The Holocaust has influenced Rabbi Weizman's life significantly. Originally from Lodz, he was the youngest son in a family with close ties to the Gerer Rebbe. He recalls playing with the Gerer Rebbe's youngest son (who later became the Gerer Rebbe himself) when both were boys.

Rabbi Weizman was the only member of his family to survive the Holocaust. He experienced the hardships of life in the Lodz Ghetto and worked as a slave labourer in a factory. He often recalled those experiences in his dvar Torahs, which also included chassidic and talmudic stories and Midrash, further spiced with gematriah, jokes and anecdotes.

Rabbi Weizman came to Winnipeg in 1953. "My wife, Reva, was a cousin of Rabbi Milton Aaron, the rabbi at [Winnipeg's] Shaarey Zedek Synagogue at the time," Rabbi Weizman recalled. "He came to meet us in Israel and felt that I would make a good rabbi for Winnipeg."

The new rabbi quickly immersed himself in the life of the community as a rabbi, cantor, teacher and shochet. As a shochet and rabbi in charge of kashrut supervision here, Rabbi Weizman was proud of the fact that for many years the Vaad Ha'ir of Winnipeg (now Western Kosher) had an exclusive contract to ship beef to Israel.

Rabbi Weizman's word on kashrut was accepted without question by leading Orthodox rabbis, including Rabbi Moshe Feinstein and Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung, in North America and Israel.

In 1957, a new synagogue, the Bnay Abraham, which was initially Orthodox, opened, and Rabbi Weizman was invited to become its spiritual leader. That was a position he filled until the mid-1990s, when the congregation decided to hire a younger rabbi.

In 1999, however, Rabbi Weizman, who became rabbi emeritus at Bnay Abraham, found his services in demand at Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue as the interim rabbi, while the congregation sought a replacement for the retired Rabbi Joseph Kelman. Rabbi Weizman served at Beth Emeth for 18 months, until Rabbi Howard Morrison was hired.

Rabbi Weizman's association with Beth Emeth actually goes back 20 years. It is the shul where he davens when he is in Toronto to visit his daughter, Tzila Schneid.

On returning to Winnipeg, he once more became the spiritual leader of the Bnay Abraham, in place of his departed successor. In 2002, his traditional congregation voted to merge with two other large Conservative congregations in north Winnipeg to form Congregation Etz Chayim. Although Rabbi Weizman once again became rabbi emeritus, some of his former Bnay Abraham congregants joined the smaller Chavurat Tefilah, and the rabbi also began attending that synagogue on a weekly basis.

"I have spent the majority of my life in Winnipeg, and I have learned a lot here," he said. "Most importantly, I learned about the cycles of life – birth, marriage, life and death. In Europe, I mainly experienced death. I am thankful to Canada and Winnipeg."

He is excited about the upcoming dinner in his honour. "All creation likes to be noticed and appreciated. That's why grass and trees grow, and wildflowers come in so many colours," he said.

In July, Rabbi Weizman will be filling in for Rabbi Morrison for the month at Beth Emeth, where he will also give lectures every Thursday morning after davening when he is in town. He will be back in Winnipeg in August for the tribute dinner. Following that, he plans to put his house up for sale and move permanently to Toronto.

For more information about the dinner honouring Rabbi Weizman, call 204-477-7460 or e-mail jhc@jhcwc.org.

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

By day, he's a philosophy lover who sports thick glasses and a button-down shirt. Come nighttime, he's a popular Toronto-based hip-hop artist who goes by the name Mighty Rhino. Meet Noah Aaron Moses Goodbaum.

Goodbaum, 21, performs regularly at the Revival Bar on College Street, a hot spot for Toronto's hip-hop karaoke scene, where rap lovers perform the lyrics of hip-hop classics before a live audience

Goodbaum, who grew up as a member of Congregation Darchei Noam, Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, says that hip hop has a strong religious element at its core.

"I have a Jewish grounding – a spiritual springboard for my work. There are certain values instilled in me by Judaism – devotion to learning, or valuing righteousness in word and deed over superficial displays of piety. All of these ideas have informed my understanding of the world as a human being, and thus my art."

He adds that his original raps are "informed by a pluralism and a universalism which Reconstructionist Judaism contributed to. A lot of my raps feature a call to religious universalism, partly informed by the ethics of thinkers like [the founder of Reconstructionist Judaism, Rabbi] Mordecai Kaplan."

Many of Goodbaum's raps feature cursing alongside a call to spiritual renewal. "I like mixing the sacred with the profane, because of the redemptive effect of beauty mined from ugliness," he says.

He has also performed political raps, covering topics from former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's message of global peace to the prospects for an independent Kurdistan.

In addition to his own raps, he also performs the works of famous rappers such as Busta Rhymes and Raekwon the Chef at hip-hop karaoke events.

Noah Goodbaum, a.k.a. Mighty Rhino, performs raps that combine the sacred and the profane.

"A lot of the performers [in the hip-hop karaoke scene] are very ordinary people from modest backgrounds, who just want to pay tribute to the culture they love," he says.

While some karaoke events bring out competitive and aggressive tendencies in audiences, Goodbaum describes the hip-hop karaoke crowd as warm and receptive.

"You're working with a beautiful artistic and cultural legacy, which means a lot to the audience. Even if your performance is bad, you still get cheered."

Then again, Goodbaum isn't exactly bad at this. He has developed a large fan base of hip-hop lovers across North America, including famous rappers such as Masta Ace and Maestro Fresh Wes.

Goodbaum attributes his popularity to the standup "preaching" act he performs before every set. "MC'ing is about moving the crowd and controlling the mike," he says.

He chose the name Mighty Rhino in part to honour the Mighty Sparrow, a calypso artist, and to pay tribute to the Sparrow's showmanship and energy. "I want to be a live wire," Goodbaum says.

The energy at hip-hop events can be electrifying. "I like the hyped-up, manic pace of it all," he says. "I like to think that in rap, either you 'move' them intellectually, and make them pause and think and reflect, or you 'move' them by making them jump and scream and dance."

His success stems also in part from the contrast between his reserved manner and the culture he loves. "People find it bizarre and engaging to see this meek guy with intellectual and religious pursuits doing crazy stuff in rap culture," Goodbaum says. "In my normal life, I'm often very reserved, but on the mike, there's a certain frenzy and adrenaline in me."

But acceptance was not instantaneous for the young artist. "I have certain disabilities that would appear to be inhibitors – cerebral palsy, a non-verbal learning disability, and obsessive compulsive disorder. They got me looked at askance when I was younger – it's a bizarre potpourri of conditions."

"I'm someone who seems ought not be involved in hip hop," he says. "But hip hop has become meaningful for such a broad stratum across the globe."

He has also caught the attention of filmmakers who have asked to make a short documentary about his life. As the film deal is still in its early stages and no contracts have been signed yet, he did not want to reveal their names.

Part of Goodbaum's love for hip hop stems from the fact that it transcends boundaries and has proved to be universal.

"Hip hop has always stood in the face of a certain conventional expectation of how it should be," he says.

"It represents the experience of humans whose understanding has otherwise been marginalized, and a lot of its technique is so avant-garde I feel the world hasn't caught up. I haven't caught up," he adds.

Goodbaum was introduced to hip hop by his older brother, Digs, in 2001. "The first rap song I heard was What's Golden by Jurassic 5. He spit a verse, and I thought, 'This is my calling for life, this is how I want to spend my time.'"

Goodbaum's brother, a student of music composition at Concordia University, was a teenager during the golden age of rap music.

"I visited him, and we'd dance to hip hop for exercise in his living room. I started buying albums, and for whatever reason, even though it would appear unconventional to outside eyes, I fell in love with rap.

"It was hard to make sense of the world growing up," Goodbaum says. He recalls a lot of darkness, bitterness and anger in his childhood. Between the ages of seven and nine, he lost his mother and his two maternal grandparents.

"Then when I turned to rap. I got lost in it, and suddenly the world was a brighter place for having lost myself in it," he says. "Now I can turn to a record any time and experience the euphoria, the overwhelming joy."

For Goodbaum, hip hop is an idiom unto itself. "It's an entire alternative universe and it's dizzyingly complex, which makes it puzzling and baffling to outsiders but also extraordinary to those who care about it."

Kitchen science, good food

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

The Science of Good Food by David Joachim and Andrew Schloss with A. Philip Handel (Robert Rose Inc.) is an excellent encyclopedic guide and reference book that will bring the science of food to home cooks and professionals alike.

This A to Z reference book contains more than 1,600 entries, arranged alphabetically and cross-referenced, touching on a variety of scientific disciplines, from biology and chemistry to agriculture and nutrition. You'll learn how copper bowls affect eggs, what kind of grill gives you the best crust on a steak, how butter tenderizes cake, why artichokes make certain foods taste sweeter and what causes some people to think cilantro tastes like soap.

There are 200 colour photographs and more than 100 recipes that show the reader how to put the information into practice.

Food industry professional Andy Schloss, writer, teacher and author of 13 cookbooks, and one of the co-authors, explains: "The ultimate goal throughout the book is to provide practical information that you can use to create better-tasting food. The straightforward explanations of the what, how and why of food and cooking are intended to help you become a better and more confident cook. After all, cooking and science are really after the same thing: helping us to enjoy life. We hope this book helps you do just that."

Entries are broken into three sections called What It Is, What It Does and How It Works. There are also practical tips included in Kitchen Wisdom boxes, while more detailed science information appears in Science Wise Boxes, and food trivia items are included in a Fast Facts section.

When the weather is hot and you don't feel like spending long hours in the kitchen making time-consuming meals, there's nothing simpler or more satisfying than a hearty salad. Here is a simple salad, along with some helpful kitchen science from The Science of Good Food for your reading and eating pleasure. Enjoy the sweet taste of success!

The most common cabbages are green, red and savoy types. Savoy cabbage has a somewhat looser head than green and red types, with softer, ruffled leaves. It's also milder in flavour. These types can be eaten raw in salads like coleslaw, or fermented to make sauerkraut. Cabbage can also be braised, steamed or boiled, then used as a wrapping for ground meats.

Napa cabbage more closely resembles an elongated version of green or savoy cabbage. It has broad pale green leaves in a somewhat tightly packed, bullet-shaped head. Napa cabbage tends to be moister, more tender and milder in flavour than other cabbages.

APPLE AND CABBAGE COLESLAW

Always start coleslaw by salting the cabbage to rid it of extra moisture. The easiest way is in a colander set in a sink. That way the excess cabbage juice runs down the drain and doesn't dilute the dressing.

2 lb. cabbage, any type, cored and thinly shredded
2 large Granny Smith apples, coarsely grated
2 tsp. kosher salt, divided Dressing:
1/4 cup sour cream
3 tbsp. mayonnaise
3 tbsp. red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. orange marmalade
2 tbsp. ketchup
1 tbsp. hot pepper sauce
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 bunch green onions, trimmed and thinly sliced

In a large colander set in a sink, toss cabbage and apple with 1-1/2 tsp. of the salt and let stand for 10 minutes.

Dressing: in a large bowl, combine remaining salt, sour cream, mayonnaise, vinegar, marmalade, ketchup, hot pepper sauce and pepper.

Squeeze excess moisture from cabbage and apples and add to the dressing along with green onions; toss to combine. Refrigerate for about 1 hour before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Obituary

Rabbi Kelman

Rabbi Abraham Kelman said that, when his brother saw there was a need, he responded, "because he cared deeply."

The closing of She'arim last year hurt Rabbi Kelman terribly, his brother said. "He was ready to go on an individual campaign to continue the work."

It was only at the behest of his family that he reluctantly agreed not to, his brother added.

"He was a gem of a person. In many ways he was a one and only."

One family member after another attested to Rabbi Kelman's devotion to them, despite the demands of the rabbinate and the hours he spent on community needs.

He spoke to his siblings and children every day, called his out-of-town grandchildren weekly before Shabbat, and wrote letters to his extended family following simchahs.

As well, Rabbi Jay Kelman said, his father never missed a family dinner, although he often left immediately afterward for a meeting.

Rabbi Schild – a native of Germany who was welcomed into the Kelman family's Markham Street home as a refugee in the 1940s – recalled Rabbi Kelman's ability to mediate, and his rare combination of passion and a centrist philosophy.

"We often associate passion with the extremes," noted Rabbi Schild. "I think my friend and colleague exemplified the potential and the power of the middle.

"He could reach out to all members of the community, irrespective of their place on the social or economic or religious spectrum."

Rabbi Kelman "remained true to the traditional background of his family," said Rabbi Schild. "He considered himself an Orthodox rabbi, and yet he was able to lead a wonderful Conservative congregation to greatness in the community."

Rabbi Schild called Rabbi Kelman "a healing influence in the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the rabbinate in general… He embraced us all."

Rabbi Kelman, one of six children, was a native of Vienna who immigrated at age three. An eighth-generation rabbi, he lost his father, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kelman, at age nine. His mother, Mirl, only 36 at the time, was a national president of Mizrachi and an organizer of a march through Kensington Market to protest against Jewish businesses remaining open on Shabbat.

The future rabbi attended King Edward Public School, Harbord Collegiate and Yeshiva University, following studies with Toronto's Rabbi Abraham Price.

Rabbi Kelman married his first wife, Ruth, in 1953. She predeceased him in 1999. They lived in Quebec, New York and Massachusetts, where Rabbi Kelman served his first pulpits.

In 1959, they returned to Toronto and the fledgling Beth Emeth congregation. Under Rabbi Kelman's leadership, the shul grew to more than 1,500 families at the time of his retirement in 1997.

Gutenberg – who had returned from Israel to attend her father's funeral just 36 hours after celebrating her son's wedding – said her father "truly left this world having made a difference.

Her youngest brother, Rabbi Maury Kelman, had stayed in Toronto and kept the news of their father's death from her and their brother, Rabbi Jay Kelman, for 24 hours.

"One of the last conversations my father had was to tell Jay to come to the wedding," recalled Gutenberg, praising their younger brother's strength in ensuring that no one learned of their father's death until after the celebration. "You did what Daddy would have wanted you to do."

Rabbi Kelman leaves Sara, his wife of eight years; his brother Rabbi Abraham Kelman; his sister Claire Goldstein; his children Tova Gutenberg and rabbis Jay and Maury Kelman; and 10 grandchildren. He was predeceased by his first wife Ruth, and by his siblings Rabbi Wolfe Kelman, Celia Silber and Tobie Silverman.

Little Synagogue opens in Calgary's Heritage Park

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — The Little Synagogue, the latest addition to Heritage Park Historical Village in Calgary, opened recently.

About 2,000 people celebrating the June 28 opening gathered at Switzer's Grocery and Confectionery in Heritage Town Square to begin a lively Torah procession through the gates of the park and into the Montefiore Institute, or, as it is known, the Little Synagogue.

The synagogue's opening and dedication is a dream come true for Irena Karshenbaum. Karshenbaum and the project's team of volunteers relocated and restored the tiny institute, which was built in 1916 on the Joseph Chetner farm near Sibbald, Alta., and served as a school, synagogue and community centre for about 30 Jewish families.

Harsh farming conditions caused the Jewish colonists to abandon the Montefiore Institute in,the 1930s. In 1937, the government sold the building to a non-Jewish family, who moved it to Hanna, Alta., and turned it into a two-bedroom home.

Emanuel Cohen, a board member of the Little Synagogue on the Prairie Project Society, tracked down the institute. The building had remained in the same family for generations, and they had no idea they were living in the Jewish settlers' institute, and one of the few surviving, original prairie shuls.

The society purchased the shul for $55,000 and transported it to Calgary. Volunteers worked tirelessly to raise funds – the project cost approximately $1 million – develop interpretative materials, gather and build furniture, and collect books to replicate the synagogue's library.

The society's efforts paid off. As Calgary businessman and philanthropist Sam Switzer installed the Montefiore Institute's Torah with the lieutenant-governor of Alberta, Norman Kwong, the pride and sheer happiness among the evening's participants was palpable.

These feelings continued throughout the ceremony, which was MCed by board member Daryl Fridhandler and included speeches by Calgary Mayor Dave Bronconnier; Kwong; Calgary Jewish Community Council president Gerry Barron; Calgary Centre MP Lee Richardson; Heritage Park president and CEO, Alida Visbach; Karshenbaum, and Culture and Community Spirit Minister Lindsay Blackett.

The speakers said that the Little Synagogue symbolizes the Canadian values of diversity, inclusion and freedom of religion, and that the Jewish community has contributed to Alberta since the province's first Jewish pioneers arrived in 1889, and to Canada as a whole. The speakers also said that that the Little Synagogue will expose many non-Jewish visitors to Heritage Park to the province's Jewish history.

When people visit the Montefiore Institute, they will come away not only with a deeper sense of Jewish culture and religion, said Kwong, but also with a deeper sense of the things that unite us all, regardless of our backgrounds.

Little Synagogue on the Prairie Project Society president Karshenbaum's speech was especially touching. It is the 120th anniversary of Jewish life in Calgary, she said.

Thirty years ago, Karshenbaum and her parents immigrated to Canada from the former Soviet Union.

"Where I come from, we had to hide being Jewish," she recalled, in tears. "With the Montefiore Institute, the Jewish community is not hiding – we are celebrating who we are."

Karshenbaum told the crowd about her father, Ilya, who died shortly before she began the project. She said that after her family had immigrated, her father received a letter from a non-Jewish woman in Moscow who needed a wheelchair. Her father raised the money for the wheelchair, purchased it on his next visit to Moscow and gave it to the woman. "What is your wheelchair project, your Little Synagogue project, your tikkun olam?" Karshenbaum asked the crowd.

After prayers and the blowing of a shofar by Darryl Gurevitch, Karshenbaum and Kwong cut the ribbon.

Fridhandler said: "Remembering history is so important. We're bringing Jewish culture and the community into the public space, so others can learn about our religious traditions."

Becky Rabinovitch, 23, said: "The fact that you have so many people who haven't come out to events in years come to this event is a testimonial to how important it is. It's just really cool."

Calgary realtor Gary Fayerman said: "I think it's really important that the Jewish community gets behind anything that's important to Jewish heritage and culture in Calgary. It's nice to see young kids performing, and that so many people came out."

Cantor Alex Stein led the choirs of Akiva Academy, the Calgary Jewish Academy and Voices Jewish Senior's Choir in singing Hatikvah and Shehechiyanu. The reception included music and dancing with singer Florence Shustack and the "Take the OY Train" Klezmer Ensemble.

Journalism student wins award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When 19-year-old Josh Cooper began his academic career in broadcast journalism to pursue his dream of becoming a sports broadcaster, he never imagined he'd be accepting an award for a radio documentary he produced on Holocaust denial.

Late last month, Cooper – who completed a two-year broadcast journalism program at Fanshaw College in London, Ont., and will begin the third-year post-graduate program at the college to study television news in September – beat out more than 30 hopefuls to receive a $2,000 award for the best second-, third- or fourth-year entry at an annual contest held by the Radio and Television News Directors' Foundation in Toronto.

Josh Cooper, right, receiving the award from RTNDF President Ken Kingston

The RTNDF was established by the Association of Electronic Journalists in 1978 to offer financial assistance to students in Canada.

The four-minute piece for which Cooper received the award was inspired by the Pope's decision in January to lift the excommunication order against Bishop Richard Williamson, who said he doubted the accuracy of the accepted facts about the Holocaust.

Bishop Williamson was quoted in an interview with Swedish television, saying that "the historical evidence is hugely against six million Jews having been deliberately gassed in gas chambers as a deliberate policy of Adolf Hitler" and that "there were no gas chambers."

He also said that only 200,000 to 300,000 Jews perished in Nazi concentration camps.

The piece also makes mention of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has often made claims that the number of Jewish victims of the Holocaust are greatly exaggerated, the Nazis did not have a plan to systematically annihilate the Jews and that gas chambers were not used to kill Jews en masse.

Speaking about the phenomenon of Holocaust denial, Cooper interviewed 87-year-old Holocaust survivor Wolf Schweitzer and London-area Rabbi Mordechai Silberberg.

Although reporting about issues such as Holocaust denial is a far cry from sports broadcasting, Cooper said that his Jewish background and his interest in Middle East politics influenced his decision to tackle the issue for a class assignment.

"I've gotten more into news since I began the program, and I've done more news pieces. I'm very interested in Middle Eastern politics. I'd heard what Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had been saying, and I had connections to speak to a Holocaust survivor and it all worked out perfectly," Cooper said.

He said that when he heard about the RTNDF contest from his professor, he thought about which of his pieces would make the best submission.

"I got better marks on other documentaries, but I felt that it was a historical tragedy and it will touch people's hearts, but at the same time, it was a newsworthy subject, so it was perfect," Cooper said.

He said that it was only at the award ceremony that he realized he would have to speak after the award was presented to him.

"I didn't know that. So, I'm not the best public speaker," he said with a laugh.

"My dad gave me a pin to wear, made of gold and diamonds. It was my grandfather's. They gave it to him when he [completed] 50 years in [his field of] dentistry. I wore that. He died a year ago, but the day I accepted the award was his birthday," Cooper recalled.

He added that beyond the recognition for his work, he was happy he had the opportunity to shmooze with some of the broadcasting industry's well-known figures such as Scott Metcalfe from the radio station 680 News in Toronto.

"This weekend was just such a great weekend. I did a lot of networking. I might have an internship with 680 News set up."

Cooper said he still has ambitions to work in sports broadcasting, "but for now, I'm keeping my options open. I'd love to work in news."

A World of Jewish Experience

The Clergy, Executive, Board of Directors and Staff of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue extend heartfelt condolences on behalf of the entire congregational family, to Sara Schafler Kelman, Rabbi Abraham Kelman, Claire Goldstein Tova Gutenberg, Rabbi Jay Kelman, Rabbi Maury Kelman and families on the passing of their beloved husband, brother, father and grandfather

Rabbi Joseph Kelman ז"ל

Acknowledging Rabbi Kelman's many years of devoted service and accomplishments to our Synagogue and the Jewish Community. He was a pillar of our community and an inspiration to all who knew him. He will be deeply missed.
May his memory be for a blessing and may the Kelman family find comfort with all the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Cotler urges Germany to clamp down on Iran

By BENJAMIN WEINTHAL
Special to The CJN

BERLIN — Former Canadian justice minister and current Liberal MP Irwin Cotler is urging the German government to take a leadership role within the European Union and impose tough, multi-pronged sanctions on Iran.

"Germany is uniquely placed to take leadership… Germany can speak with moral authority born out of its understanding of state-sanctioned incitement to genocide," said Cotler, a Mount Royal MP and the Liberal party's special counsel on human rights and international justice.

He made the comments last Thursday at a forum at Berlin's Jewish community centre titled "Western Democracies, Iran and the Prevention of Genocide," which was sponsored by the Coordinating Council of German Non-governmental Organizations Against Anti-Semitism.

Iran's president has threatened to "wipe Israel off the map," and the Islamic republic has been sanctioned by the United Nations Security Council for refusing to suspend its nuclear enrichment program, which can be used to make nuclear weapons. Iran claims its nuclear program is for civilian use.

"Here is an opportunity for leverage," said Cotler about Germany's $5.7-billion dollar trade relationship with Iran. He sharply criticized Daniel Bernbeck, the head of the German-Iranian Chamber of Industry and Commerce in Tehran, who told Associated Press that he sees "no moral question here at all" about commencing business deals with Iran during its suppression of the popular movement against recent Iranian election results.

An "important role for civil society is to hold the Daniel Bernbecks to account," Cotler said.

In early June, Cotler introduced the Iran Accountability Act (IAA) in Parliament, which seeks to pressure Tehran to modify its behaviour in three areas: human rights, adherence to the international Genocide Convention, and its nuclear weapons program. The IAA would sanction firms that refine petroleum for Iran's gas-starved economy and would allow Ottawa to disrupt the operation of businesses supporting Iran's military and nuclear sectors.

In contrast to U.S. legislation, which focuses exclusively on economic sanctions, the IAA also aims to force Iran to comply with the Genocide Convention and international law.

Lax trade regulations in Germany concerning the supply of so-called dual-use technology, which can be used for military and civilian purposed, caused an unfolding scandal involving the German engineering giant Siemens. The company sold surveillance technology last year to the Iranian regime that was used to block and monitor Internet, Twitter and cellphone communications of protesters after the June 12 election, which Iranian opposition leaders and external observers say was rigged in favour of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Cotler said the IAA can be a "model or template that other parliaments can adopt."

When asked whether German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who is also the Social Democratic Party candidate for chancellor, would seek comparable legislation to sanction Iran, foreign ministry spokesperson Niklas Wagner told The CJN in an e-mail that with respect to Iran's nuclear program, Steinmeier will "continue to push hard within [Germany's] federal government and within the European Union" for sanctions if Tehran doesn't compromise.

Critics argue that Germany's "discouragement strategy," which urges German firms to voluntarily restrict trade with Iran, has failed – in 2008, commerce mushroomed by 10.5 per cent over 2007.

Germany has consistently been Iran's largest EU trading partner.

Asked about Cotler's appeal to the German government to initiate a criminal legal proceeding charging Ahmadinejad with violating the Geneva Convention's prohibition against incitement to genocide, Wagner said, "The federal government and the foreign office have frequently taken a clear position on the unacceptable anti-Semitic statements on Israel by Iranian politicians.

"These statements are completely irresponsible and unacceptable and demand our joint condemnation. We will continue to respond decisively to such statements in the future."

Daniel Barbarie, a spokesperson for Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, told The CJN that "Canada already has in place restrictions to limit relations with Iran under the Tightened Controlled Engagement Policy" and has brought its laws in line with UN Security Council restrictions on Iranian nuclear research.

He added that Canada "will continue monitoring developments related to Iran's nuclear program and reviewing our options on potential further action."

Cotler urged the international community, particularly Germany, to engage in "political action" because "silence is not an option" and "indifference is a danger." He cited the example of Canada not participating in the recent UN anti-racism followup conference, known as Durban II, due to the expectation it would be an anti-Israel and anti-Semitic affair.

"It takes one to exercise moral leadership. Canada did it with Durban II. Germany can do it with Iran."

'Israel can determine for itself'

Before the protests in Iran began, Israel's assessment was that the planned American-Iranian dialogue had little chance of succeeding, the official said. But in light of the protests and the Iranian hard-liners' need to shore up their rule, Israel's intelligence community believes the chances of the dialogue even beginning, much less succeeding, are near zero.

However, Washington has so far rejected the "Plan B" idea.

American officials have told their Israeli counterparts they are aware of the frustration in Israel, Europe and the Gulf states over Washington's insistence on going ahead with the dialogue with Iran, and that they also do not believe the chances of success are high.

Nevertheless, they said, if the United States starts laying the groundwork for stiffer sanctions now, this would signal to the Iranians that Obama is not serious about dialogue with Tehran, which would foil any chances of success that the dialogue might have.

Israeli officials said co-operation with Germany, Britain and France has been fruitful, and that the three European powers have been working with Israel to achieve two goals: getting the United States to assess the progress of the dialogue with Iran during the UN General Assembly meeting in September rather than waiting another few months, and securing publication of the military appendix to the International Atomic Energy Agency report on Iran due to be submitted in September.

Meanwhile, U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden said Sunday that Israel will decide for itself whether to attack Iran.

In an interview with ABC television, Biden said: "Israel can determine for itself – it's a sovereign nation – what's in their interest and what they decide to do relative to Iran and anyone else. Whether we agree or not, they're entitled to do that. Any sovereign nation is entitled to do that."

Biden insisted that pressure from Israel or other countries would not affect the Americans' planned dialogue with Iran. "There is no pressure from any nation that is going to alter our behaviour as to how to proceed," he said, adding that Washington believes this dialogue serves America's interests, as well as those of Israel and the rest of the world.

Schalit an honorary Italian

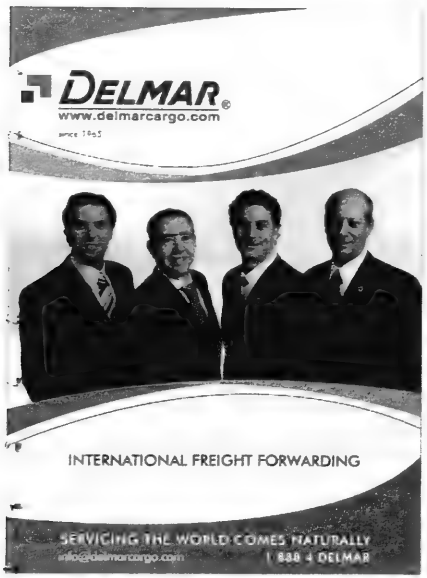
Rome has given honorary citizenship to Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier kidnapped by Hamas three years ago. Schalit's father, Noam, was in Rome to receive the honour in a July 1 ceremony at city hall. A giant photo of the soldier hung in the piazza, with the words "Rome wants its citizen Gilad Schalit free" – words Rome Mayor Gianni Alemanno repeated at the evening ceremony.

Amnesty report biased: Israel

Amnesty International was manipulated by Hamas in its report that accused Israel of committing war crimes during its Gaza military operation, the Israeli army said. "We find it both questionable and objectionable that a well-respected and ostensibly objective international organization such as Amnesty could produce a report on Operation Cast Lead without properly recognizing the unbearable reality of nine years of incessant and indiscriminate rocket fire on the citizens of Israel," read a statement released from the office of the spokesperson of the Israel Defence Forces. The report released July 2 accused Israeli forces of using civilians, including children, as human shields and conducting random attacks on civilians during the operation in December and January. The IDF spokesperson said that "the IDF utilized various fighting methods and advanced technology to minimize harm to the civilian population, while engaging terrorists who were operating from densely populated areas and using the local population as a human shield."Amnesty said in its report that it didn't find any evidence that Hamas used civilians as human shields. But in a small section of the 117-page report, it said rocket attacks from Gaza against Israel "constitute war crimes."

Submarine sails Suez Canal

An Israeli submarine sailed the Suez Canal to the Red Sea as part of a naval drill last month, defence sources said, describing the unusual manoeuvre as a show of strategic reach in the face of Iran. Israel has long kept its three Dolphin-class submarines, which are widely assumed to carry nuclear missiles, away from the Suez so as not to expose them to the gaze of Egyptian harbourmasters.



Last chance for Holocaust restitution?

JTA

Analysis

It has the tone of a newspaper from Berlin in 1936, except it's from Vilnius in 2009.

The face of a rabbi is enlarged on the cover of a Lithuanian tabloid with the words, "Give it now!" emblazoned across the top. The subject, Rabbi Andrew Baker, director of international affairs for the American Jewish Committee, is cast as the villain, looking down on a miniature Lithuanian Prime Minister Andrius Kubilius, portrayed as defenceless at the hands of some Shylock.

The image, which appeared on the June 26 edition of the popular right-wing daily Vakaro Zinios (Evening News), alludes to Rabbi Baker's demand that the Lithuanian government return Jewish property after eight years of promises to do so.

In lieu of restitution, Lithuania wants to pay just one-third of the value of Jewish property confiscated by the Nazis and Communists – $46 million – over 10 years and starting in 2011.

Lithuania's Jews and their advocates, including Rabbi Baker, are not satisfied.

"It is far too little, far too late," he says.

The Lithuania case represents the stalling tactics, lack of political will and nationalist-fuelled resentment of Jews that have frustrated efforts by Jewish owners, heirs and their advocates to recover property stolen by the Nazis and the Communists in central and eastern Europe.

The economic crisis has made it even more difficult to get local politicians to take action on restitution.

In a significant gesture, 46 countries last month signed a declaration at the close of a Holocaust Era Assets Conference in Prague aimed at easing the restitution process for Jewish property taken during the Nazi era. The Terezin Declaration is a non-binding set of guiding principles aimed at faster, more open and transparent restitution of art and private and communal property taken by force or under duress during the Holocaust.

"Back in the late 1990s, NATO membership was a driving motivation for countries in eastern Europe, who were told by the U.S. government that how they treated their Jews will be a key factor in their admission," Rabbi Baker said.

This was in stark contrast to the European Union, which did not make any demands for restitution. In fact, the European Union lifted a requirement for restitution that would have blocked Poland's 2004 admission to the 27-country union.

Pressured by the United States and Jewish groups since the fall of the Iron Curtain two decades ago, most countries previously under the sway of the Soviet Union have made some attempts at communal and private restitution or compensation.

There are two major sore spots within the European Union: Poland and Lithuania. Poland, where three million Jews lived before World War II – the largest Jewish prewar population in any country – has no private restitution law for Jews or non-Jews.

In the area of looted art, progress has been much slower than for compensating the rightful owners of confiscated properties.

The U.S. government estimates that 600,000 paintings were looted by the Nazis, with 100,000 still not accounted for.

Forty-four countries agreed to another set of non-binding principles on the return of looted art at a 1998 conference in Washington, but only four countries have made "major progress" in implementing the principles, according to the Claims Conference, and 23 have made no significant progress.

The Washington principles were supposed to ease the claims process and called for greater research into collections, the opening of archives and the removal of barriers for claimants, such as statutes of limitations and export laws.

"The Hungarian experience may be described as a total and concerted effort by successive governments to keep the looted art in their museums, even if it requires that the museums conceal or destroy archival evidence or deliberately lengthen negotiations – effectively delaying legal actions that would be filed against the state," Agnes Peresztegi, a lawyer with the Commission for Art Recovery, told attendees of the Prague conference.

In the Czech Republic, only direct heirs of deceased owners, not nieces or nephews, can make art claims, even though this contravenes Czech inheritance law.

In the United States, claimants often must wage lengthy legal battles against museums because there is no national arbitration commission.

In most countries, museums do not even know if their art was looted because they cannot afford to document the history of their holdings.

To address these obstacles, the declaration in Prague calls for the establishment of a Holocaust institute in Terezin, where the concentration camp was located. The institute would study "best practices" in compensation, restitution, looted art research, Holocaust education, care for Holocaust survivors and combating anti-Semitism.

Claimants face obstacles

JTA

PRAGUE — Claimants of looted art, communal property or private property face serious obstacles in 10 European Union countries.

• Poland: Has not enacted any form of private restitution or compensation for an estimated $30.5 billion worth of property confiscated by Nazis or Communists. The Jewish share of claims on those properties is estimated at 20 to 27 per cent. Poland has a slow and burdensome process for restitution of Jewish communal property. Since 1997, 5,500 claims were filed, but only 1,625 were adjudicated.

• Lithuania: Has not enacted communal property restitution. The government had offered to pay $46 million over 10 years to a Jewish fund – about one-third of the value of the claimed properties – starting in 2011, before shifting recently and suggesting that such a fund might contravene Lithuanian law. A number of cultural institutions in Lithuania hold looted Jewish artifacts, and little to no provenance research has been done on holdings. Lithuania's claims process for private property bars non-citizens from making claims.

• Germany: Has supported the return of looted art, but in May it acknowledged that museums and galleries still have thousands of looted works. Provenance research, documentation of ownership and sales history are underfunded. The government commission that handles art claims is viewed as ineffective because it requires the permission of the current art owners to mediate cases. Researchers claim museums and archives are frequently unco-operative. On property restitution, Germany is the leading European Union member to return Jewish properties.

• Ireland: Never signed the 1998 Washington Principles on Looted Art, which would require provenance research and facilitation of the claims process. The Simon Wiesenthal Center has accused the Hunt Museum, one of Ireland's greatest private collections, of housing looted art, but an Irish investigatory commission cleared the museum of wrongdoing.

• Greece: Little to no provenance research has been conducted at its numerous state museums.

• Hungary: Blocks nearly all attempts to retrieve looted art. The National Gallery and Museum of Fine Arts hold looted art.

• Romania: Has excessively slow and burdensome Jewish communal property restitution. Three hundred of 1,980 claims have been adjudicated since 1997.

• Slovenia: Private property is returned only to current citizens, and only if it was confiscated in 1945 or after.

• Bulgaria: Does not conduct provenance research at its museums.

• Spain: Has looted art in its cultural institutions, but Spain does not conduct provenance research on art.

In related developments, the Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada (JHSC) welcomed the signing of the Terezin Declaration that emerged from the Holocaust-Era Assets Conference in Prague, Czech Republic last month. The conference examined restitution progress made in the decade since the 1999 Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets and included a component on the welfare of survivors of the Holocaust and other victims of Nazi oppression. –D.S.

Einstein lives on — at Hebrew U

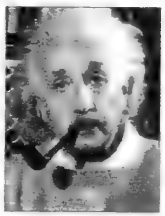
By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When one hears the name Albert Einstein, most often the image of a brilliant physicist with white, wild hair wearing a white lab coat comes to mind.

Fewer think of Einstein as a dedicated Zionist, a pacifist, the co-founder of an Israeli university and a compassionate promoter of human rights.

In June, during a six-day trip to Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University – a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for the Hebrew University of Jerusalem with chapters from coast to coast – six Canadian journalists visited the Albert Einstein Archives located at the Edmond Safra campus.

Since 1982, when the executors of Einstein's estate transferred all literary rights to Einstein's works to Hebrew U – as stipulated in his will that he drafted in 1950, five years before his death – the archives staff have promised to keep Einstein accessible.



Albert Einstein

"As we say, we own Einstein, but we share him with the entire world," said Hanoch Gutfreund, the president emeritus of Hebrew U and the co-ordinator of Einstein-related events that involve the university.

Roni Grosz, curator of the archives, said that since the early '80s, the archives has almost doubled, with more than 75,000 items to date – including books, letters and photographs.

He said that while they have the biggest collection of original Einstein material, much of the material is not original because in some cases, letters he wrote are held by heirs of a recipient, or by collectors, in which case, the archives may have acquired a carbon copy of the letter.

"We have manuscripts, we have drafts, we have material that is in his original hand, but we don't have very many outgoing letters. Sometimes we get them back, sometimes we buy them back, sometimes we get donations," Grosz said.

"Nowadays, a lot of this goes to auction and the simplest Einstein letter, a two-liner with no content, that says, 'Thank you very much for your birthday wishes for my 60th birthday,' [would fetch] $3,000," he said, adding that letters with much more substance can sell for more than $15,000.

He said the goal is to collect every communication that was written by him.

Of course, the collection will never be complete because when Einstein died in 1955, his secretary of about 27 years who was also a close friend and a co-trustee of his estate, destroyed some of his writings that she considered too private or would put him in an unfavourable light. Sitting in a room surrounded by Einstein's personal library, Gutfreund and Grosz shared some of his letters, photographs and other archival items to help paint a picture of the kind of man Einstein was beyond his scientific achievements.

Gutfreund said that Einstein wrote in his own words that there was nothing that evoked his "Jewish sentiments" until 1914, when he was 35 years old.

"This was the first time he encountered anti-Semitism in Germany, which really gained momentum and became very significant immediately after World War I when the Jews became the scapegoat of everything that happened to the Germans," Gutfreund said.

"It is then that Einstein – being that he was a very compassionate human being – used every public arena to speak out against anti-Semitism. He wrote a lot about anti-Semitism and he spoke about anti-Semitism not emotionally, but as a physicist – that this is a phenomenon of nature that we have to understand."

Gutfreund explained that in 1919, Einstein joined the Zionist movement, but his interpretation was different from mainstream Zionism.

"For many years he did not accept the goal of Zionism as a country with borders and with an army. He was thinking more in terms of a cultural and spiritual home for the Jews wherever they lived. Very gradually he shifted and supported the State of Israel when it was already independent," he said.

"He considered Zionism as a set of values, cultural values, not necessarily religious rituals… He very emotionally and intellectually adopted what he perceived as the nature of Judaism – the pursuit of knowledge and learning for its own sake, human dignity, human rights, the values of the Jewish prophets – and for that he thanked the stars that he belonged to this group, to this tribe, to this race."

Gutfreund said that Einstein's most prominent association with the Zionist movement was his commitment to Hebrew U, which he co-founded 23 years before the State of Israel was established in 1925.

In 1923, he travelled to what was then Palestine, for his first and only visit to the country, to deliver a lecture on Mount Scopus, which is now part of the Hebrew U campus.

"The lecture is a story in itself. The lecture was delivered two years before the official opening of the university. He started with a few words in Hebrew, which he memorized, and he apologized for not being able to speak in the language of his forefathers. Then he spoke for 1-1/2 hours in French about the general theory of relativity," Gutfreund said.

Although Einstein would eventually decline an invitation to become Israel's second president in 1952, he worked to promote dialogue with Arab leaders who were unhappy about the acquisition of land by Zionists in the Middle East.

"Einstein wrote letters to Palestinian newspaper editors in hopes of convincing them that the Zionist ideology would benefit the entire region," Gutfreund said.

"He suggested to form a secret council where Jews and Arabs would each send four representatives who would be completely independent of any political body… These eight people would meet once a week.

"This is anecdotal, but it was very serious. This is how the man thought, this is how he operated. He did have impact."

Odet's play a tale of hardship and disappointment

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Although writer Clifford Odets' play Awake and Sing! was written more than 70 years ago, his characters' struggles are timeless.

In the early 1930s, when Odets was an aspiring actor, he was denied the lead role in a play called Success Story and forced to be the understudy of fellow actor Luther Adler. Fuelled by frustration and resentment, Odets wrote his first play, Awake and Sing!, a somewhat autobiographical tale about three generations of a New York Jewish family named Berger, during the Depression. As the family struggles to hold onto their dreams, conflicts arise, as grown children are living with their parents during tough economic times.

Playing at Toronto's Young Centre for the Performing Arts until July 31, Awake and Sing! is produced by Soulpepper Theatre Company and directed by Miles Potter. Staged in the Bergers' modest fifth-floor Bronx apartment, the set is designed by Peter Hartwell with scenes taking place in the family's meagre living room and dining areas.

Soulpepper's Nancy Palk is convincing as Bessie, the matriarch, a cruel, domineering Jewish mother who forsakes her dreams to raise a family. Disappointed that her daughter, Hennie (Sarah Wilson), is 26 years old, unmarried and dreams of marrying a millionaire, she provokes her: "When I was your age, it was already a big family with responsibilities."

"I'm not marrying a poor foreigner like him. Can't even speak an English word. Not me! I'll go to my grave without a husband."

But when Hennie gets pregnant, her plans for the future are crushed. Bessie talks her into marrying Sam, devising a plan to invite him over for dinner, hoping he'll propose by the weekend and believe it's his baby.

Palk is believable as the martyr who feels she is both mother and father to her children and rants and raves in her high-pitched voice about her family's lack of appreciation for her. But she later reveals that she also wanted to escape her destiny. "My whole life, I wanted to go away, too, but with children, a woman stays home. A fire burned my heart too, but now it's too late."

Jonathan Gould aptly plays the role of Bessie's naive son, Ralph, 22, who struggles to maintain a relationship with his non-Jewish girlfriend, Blanche, without the approval of his mother.

"Only just remember I pay some of the bills around here, just a few," he announces, "and if my girl calls me on the phone, I'll talk to her any time I please."

Bessie's father, Jacob (William Webster), escapes his daughter's sharp criticism by reading Karl Marx and listening to recordings of Italian tenor Enrico Caruso. Too old to achieve his dream, Jacob encourages his grandson, Ralph, to stand up for what's right in society and "make history."

But the one to watch is Ari Cohen, cleverly cast as the family friend Moe Axelrod, who skilfully delivers his biting yet humorous remarks. Bitter about the loss of his leg in World War I and his inability to live out his dream, he tries to win back Hennie, his true love.

The play moves slowly at first, but the pace picks up in the second act, which proves to be emotional and gripping.

Michael Jackson and the Jewish nose

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
JTA

VIENNA — Amid all the noisy outpouring over Michael Jackson's sudden death, the last place I expected to find him was in a Jewish museum. But there he was, his pale, mask-like, surgically engineered image featured as part of an exhibition at the Jewish Museum here.

Called Typical! – Cliches of Jews and Others, the exhibition deals with the use (and abuse) of ethnic stereotypes in popular culture. The exhibition, which runs until October, has been shown at the Jewish Museum in Berlin and the Spertus Museum in Chicago.

In a life-size photograph from 2002, he is shown with lank black hair framing a long, square stubbly chin, pinched red mouth, huge made-up eyes and a tiny nose with distorted pointy tip.

The photo is used to illustrate how, for better or worse, the King of Pop attempted to destroy stereotypes and, literally, to cut himself away from the confines of physical definition.

The exhibition deals with stereotypes commonly used to categorize African Americans, Muslims, women, Native Americans and others.

But given that it is mounted at a Jewish museum, much of its focus is on stereotypes about Jews. The exhibition poster employs a few sketched strokes to conjure up some: corkscrew curls, a hat and a huge hooked nose.

Indeed, the multitude of variations on the (alleged) size and shape of the Jewish nose form a major theme.

A section called "the schnoz," for example, shows a collection of 19th century walking sticks whose handles are formed by exaggerated noses. The contemporary artist Dennis Kardon's installation "Jewish Noses" features dozens of larger-than-life-sized casts made from the noses of actual Jews to demonstrate the silliness of such nasal cliches.

It also reminded me of a book I read some years ago, a vicious anti-Semitic satire called The Operated Jew, that was written in 1893 by a German doctor named Oskar Panizza.

An attack on efforts by Jews to assimilate into mainstream society, the book is a creepy and extremely disturbing tale about how a Jew named Itzig Faitel Stern tries to rid himself physically of the stereotypical signs of his Jewishness and become a "modern" European.

Foreshadowing Jackson's experiences under the knife, Stern submits to radical procedures, including the straightening and bleaching of his hair, Extreme Makeover-style cosmetic surgery, and a series of horrendous operations to straighten his bones. He even gets a full transfusion of "Christian" blood.

Panizza, an early exponent of Nazi-style racial anti-Semitism, set out to "prove" that Jews could never become part of the mainstream modern world, even if they physically attempted to change their skins.

It's not exactly clear what world Jackson was trying to become part of – or leave – with his surgeries and other transformations.

Artistically he was the ultimate crossover, winning fans of all colours, ages, religions, nationalities and sexual orientations all around the world. Over the years, though, he alienated some African Americans by his physical manipulation of identity and apparent ambivalence about his own blackness.

Death, though, appears to have brought Jackson back to his roots – or in any case to a warm embrace by the African-American community.

"We want to celebrate this black man," the actor and singer Jamie Foxx said to cheers at the Black Entertainment Television Music Awards. "He belongs to us, and we shared him with everybody else.

"It didn't matter what he looked like, it was all about what he sounded like. It didn't matter what his nose looked like – I loved the old nose and the new nose."

Bleibergs is a unique Berlin kosher restaurant

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BERLIN — This cosmopolitan city of 3.4 million inhabitants prides itself on its dazzling array of restaurants and cafes, but there is no other restaurant in Berlin quite like Bleibergs.

A small, cozy, casual place found at 45A Nurnbergerstrasse, Bleibergs is Berlin's one and only certifiably kosher vegetarian restaurant, according to its co-proprietor, Manuela Hoffmann.

Centrally located, and within easy walking or subway distance of some of Berlin's major tourist attractions, Bleibergs – which is under the supervision of the Berlin rabbinate's Rabbi Yitzhak Ehrenberg – definitely fills a need when hunger pangs strike.

The menu features an eclectic selection of European and Israeli-style food: mixed salads, sandwiches, hummus, gefilte fish, latkes, pizzas, spaghetti, soups, tofu and vegetarian burgers and sausages, as well as sweets and pastries.

During the summer season, Bleibergs is open for business from Sunday to Thursday from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

On Fridays, it is open from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. It is closed on Saturdays and Jewish holidays.

I dropped in for lunch and ordered a vegetable soup and cheese blintzes, both of which were satisfying.

For dessert, I chose a delicious poppy seed cake, washed down with an aromatic cappuccino.

"I filled a niche," she said. "There was not a kosher vegetarian, dairy, fish restaurant in the city."

Although foreign visitors comprise much of its clientele, Bleibergs is also frequented by local Germans with a yen for Jewish food.

She depends on her non-Jewish customers. "There are simply not enough Jewish people in Berlin who insist on eating kosher," she explained.

Surprisingly, Hoffmann's chef is Mongolian. "We told her what we have to look for, and today she's almost perfect."

Hoffmann's first chef was an Israeli, but he didn't last long.

Bleibergs offers kabbalat Shabbat evenings every two weeks.

Hoffmann, a travel agent on the side, runs a bed-and-breakfast operation on the premises. The three non-smoking guest rooms are accessible by elevator.

Bleibergs – which is adjacent to a Turkish restaurant and practically next door to the Augsburgerstrasse subway station – is close to Kufurstendamm, a major boulevard dotted with upscale shops and cafes, and the Jewish community centre at 79-80 Fasanenstrasse.

It is also near KaDeWe, a large, elegant department store whose sixth floor food department is easily one of the finest in Europe.

By subway, Bleibergs is a short subway ride away from the Jewish Museum, which traces German-Jewish history from Roman times to the present, and the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, which commemorates the Holocaust.

Hoffmann, 55, was born and raised in Berlin. She is the daughter of Holocaust survivors from Breslau, which was part of Germany before World War II.

With the 1945 Potsdam agreement, Breslau, in Lower Silesia, was ceded to Poland, and today is known as Wroclaw.

As might be expected, Bleibergs is not the only kosher restaurant in Berlin, whose registered Jewish population is estimated to be 15,000.

Beth Cafe, under the supervision of the Orthodox Adass Jisroel Synagogue, is on 40 Tucholskystrasse, while Plaetzl Imbiss, which like Bleibergs is under the supervision of Rabbi Ehrenberg, is at 4 Passauerstrasse.

Gabriel's, inside the Jewish community centre, the site of a synagogue destroyed on Kristallnacht in November 1938, is also under the supervision of Rabbi Ehrenberg.

Now a museum devoted to Jewish history, the shul was inaugurated in 1866. With a seating capacity of 3,200, it was Germany's largest shul.

Desecrated on Kristallnacht and accidentally bombed by Allied aircraft during the war, it was a brooding ruin until it was rescued from oblivion.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS ON VIEW AT THE ROM

Last week's media opening of the Royal Ontario Museum's new exhibition, Dead Sea Scrolls. Words That Changed the World, brought out a crowd of more than 100 print, television and radio journalists. The exhibition was officially opened by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty, while guest curator Risa Levitt Kohn – an alumna of both York University and the University of Toronto, and director of the Jewish studies program at San Diego State University – offered some cogent commentary about the scrolls and their vast historical significance.

The displays leading up to and incorporating the scrolls provide full interpretation, translation and background information about the scrolls and the tumultuous period in which they were written and hidden. The Israel Antiquities Authority has loaned the ROM more than 200 artifacts, including lamps, ossuaries, amphorae, jugs, stone table ware and, most notably, architectural fragments of the Second Temple.

The ROM's fairly new display space has received its share of criticism for its jagged corners and angular and intrusive pillars, and when you add the sizable crowds that this exhibition is expected to attract, it may be hard to get close enough to any of the scrolls for a thorough inspection. In any case, for reasons of preservation, the light is so dim that reading any of the original early Hebrew texts may be somewhat difficult. It's probably best to rely on the handy enlarged reproductions posted above each scroll.

This is an exciting coup for the ROM and a proud moment for the Jews of Toronto as a rich sampling of our historic legacy, preserved in these 2,000-year-old scraps of parchment, goes on view for the whole city to appreciate. While the exhibition continues to early January 2010, there will be two showings of scrolls. The first group remains on view through Oct. 9, after which a new group is to be installed.

Numerous lectures and two art installations are being offered in conjunction with the exhibit. One of the installations, Margins, by New York artist Johua Neustein, offers a poetic reflection on writing, religion and archeology. It is presented by the ROM's Institute for Contemporary Culture, in conjunction with the Koffler Gallery of the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Names in the News: Kudos to Bunny Iskov, recipient of Vaughan's first RAVE (Recognizing Arts Excellence in Vaughan) award. Iskov is a judge of an annual literary contest sponsored by the Vaughan Public Library and often visits schools to talk poetry with students. She is also the founder of the Ontario Poetry Society (www.ontariopoetrysociety.com), which is nearly 10 years old and has more than 200 members. "I was really excited and honoured to be nominated for this award, and I never expected to be chosen," she said.

Jonno Katz

• Playwright A. David Levine received an honourable mention for best original production last month for his play Reflections on Giving Birth to a Squid, which was performed at the Fringe Festival in Montreal. The piece, which highlights the rather unkosher subject of a woman becoming mother to a cephalopod, received the praise from the Centaur Theatre; it was also part of the Fringe in Toronto and other cities.

True story of sisters sheltered by nuns

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Guardian Angel House by Kathy Clark is based on the true story of two young Hungarian Jewish sisters, Susan and Vera, who were sheltered by nuns during the Holocaust.

Susan and Vera are the author's real-life mother and aunt. The book, published by Second Story Press, is part of the award-winning Holocaust Remembrance Book for Young Readers series.

Clark, who lives outside Ottawa, wrote Guardian Angel House after watching a Hungarian documentary about the nuns at the Sisters of Charity in Budapest.

She begins the book with a useful introduction that explains the setting of the book. A young reader, unfamiliar with the history of the World War II and the Holocaust, will learn about Hitler's Aryan policies and how Hungary's Jews were able to avoid the transports until Germany invaded Hungary in 1944.

After their father was arrested by Hungarian police, the girls' mother was talked into sending the girls to the convent by Isi, a Catholic who is a close family friend. Isi later helped their mother survive in the ghetto by throwing her bags of food.

There were many other Jewish girls hiding in the convent. Although they attended daily church services in Latin, took catechism classes and said the rosary, the nuns made no attempt to convert them and even allowed them to pray in Hebrew on Fridays and celebrate Passover.

Things got tough for them as the Soviets advanced, since the convent was situated high on a hill beside a German-occupied citadel. Bombs fell on the convent grounds, and the girls had to hide in a dank crypt beneath the convent.

Overall the book is well told and fast paced. Young readers, especially girls, will admire the characters and find the book suspenseful and easy to understand, yet also very educational.

Through the makeshift seder with the nuns, Clark is able to explain the similarities between Catholicism and Judaism. And through Lena, the Gypsy girl who takes refuge in the convent, the reader will learn that Jews weren't the only people persecuted by the Nazis.

Guardian Angel House is a welcome addition to this series of award-winning books that includes Kathy Kacer's Hiding Edith, Karen Levine's Hana's Suitcase and several other renowned books.

Poet makes the transition to singer

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Jeff Bien is an acclaimed poet whose writings have allowed him to explore untapped wells of inspiration.

His works have been praised by critics and other writers. Now, he has expanded his repertoire to include songs.

The Montreal resident recently launched his first album, Songs of Forgiveness & Prayer, at Hugh's Room in Toronto. This was the first time he sang the songs live, and Bien said the reaction of the audience – mostly other authors and musicians – was positive.

"There seemed a deep sense of communion, and that's what you're hoping for – that the work you've done can enter the sanctuary of another heart," he said in an interview.

Jeff Bien

As a poet first and foremost, Bien needed to adjust to the transition of composing lyrics as opposed to poetic verse.

Bien was once asked by author Emile Martel – father of Life of Pi author Yann Martel – to explain the difference between writing poetry and composing songs. At the time, he didn't know what to say.

"They're completely different forms," he says now.

He added that when you compose music "you pick up an instrument and lyrics come mysteriously, or you're given a line and then you pick up your instrument and the process begins," but a poet is faced with "the apocalyptic white page and it's a very, very solitary activity, while music is very collaborative."

On the CD, Bien incorporates a number of musical styles from various ethnic cultures and traditions, including Mideast and Far East influences.

Bien's Jewish connection shines through prominently on the album. Bien recently heard someone singing Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach's Kol Ha'olam at the studio where he was recording, which inspired him to write a reworked version of the classic.

Having once met Rabbi Carlebach, Bien said that hearing the song again "struck a deep, deep chord" and he decided to include it on the album.

Another song on the album, Kaddish, is a reflection of his close relationship with his late mother. His musical influences for this piece are Graeme Revell, a film composer of ambient music, and Leonard Bernstein.

The additional lyrics he wrote for Adon Olam, another Jewish prayer included on the album, "seemed to follow their own journey into the piece that it became," Bien said.

While he's not an observant Jew, as a theology student, Bien said that he embraces the spiritual principles of Judaism, as well as those of other religions including Christianity, Buddhism, Sufism and Hinduism.

The oneness and unity of the natural world and its relationship to its creator is a core belief of Bien's and is a message that can be clearly heard throughout the album.

"There really is in all the mystical traditions, in the esoteric being, the nature of sameness, of oneness, just in different forms," he said.

Bien worked on Songs of Forgiveness & Prayer for several years, as the writing process was sporadically interrupted by a serious illness that he continues to struggle with.

He said that he sees his struggle as a necessary obstacle in the path toward self-fulfilment and understanding.

"From that very journey was born a work of transcendence," he said.

Bien released two CDs of spoken word poetry set to music last year and is currently working on a followup album, which he said is going to be "quite a departure" from Songs of Forgiveness & Prayer.

What he appreciates most about performing music is its communal nature,.

"It's wonderful to hear lyrics that you've written and music that you've written honoured by people who have perfected their craft," he said.

A concise history of Israel from 1948 to '67

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

On May 14, 1948, the State of Israel was born, and in less than 20 years, it emerged as a confident nation, secure both economically and militarily.

The intervening years were full of hardships for this new nation. There were three wars, terrorism, skyrocketing immigration, political rivalries and an isolation that at times mirrored that of Britain in the early years of World War II.

How Israel got from 1948 to 1967 has been the subject of many books. At less than 400 pages, though, Leslie Stein's The Making of Modern Israel (Polity Press) is a refreshing, informative and concise telling of these tumultuous years, the effects of which can still be seen in the Middle East today.

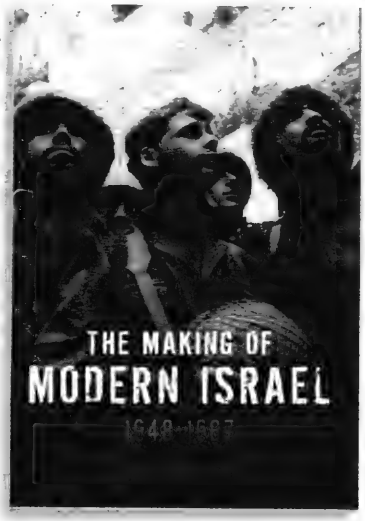
There are myriads of books written solely about the subjects of each of the nine chapters. Stein's strength is in compiling all the information in this succinct and easy-to-read book.

It begins slowly, though. The chapter on the War of Independence describes all the battles for long-forgotten villages and kibbutzim, illustrated with poorly drawn maps.

But he does tell a few amusing anecdotes from the war in this first chapter. One of the problems the Israel Defence Forces had in their early days was that many of the volunteers did not speak Hebrew. One American Jewish pilot, whose Messerschmitt plane was hit, parachuted over the Mediterranean and swam ashore. There the pilot, who had a swarthy complexion and could easily have been mistaken for an Arab, was confronted by a group from a Jewish settlement. Not knowing Hebrew, the pilot shouted "gefilte fish" over and over again. They left him alone.

The reader who makes it past the first chapter will be well rewarded with some well-researched information on Israel's social, economic and political development, refugees, immigration, terrorism, wars and politics.



Stein's use of certain adjectives and phrases betrays a hint of his Israeli bias, but, on the other hand, in a book intended to celebrate Israel's achievements, Stein does not shy away from illustrating several of Israel's misdeeds.

During the 1948 war, for example, Stein cites incidents of Israeli atrocities on Arab civilians, including rape and murder. The minister of agriculture at the time, Stein writes, likened Jewish behaviour to that of Nazis.

But these incidents were nothing compared to the Arab atrocities on Jewish settlements and even on their own villages, creating a situation so intolerable that "the [Arab] population became more afraid of their defenders than of the Jews."

Stein writes at length about Israel's miraculous achievements. Immigration to Israel doubled during the four years after the War of Independence. Operation Magic Carpet brought in almost 50,000 Jews from Yemen, and many others immigrated from Iraq, Egypt, Morocco, Syria and Iran.

The huge influx was problematic at first. The rate of immigration far exceeded the burgeoning nation's ability to absorb them, and poverty was rife in the camps they were housed in.

Also, these Mizrachi Jews tended to be poor, illiterate farmers and were the subject of much derision from Israelis of European origin.

Stein writes that the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz said at the time, "You will find among them [Mizrachim] dirt, card games for money, drunkenness and fornication."

One Iraqi said: "We left Iraq as Jews and arrived in Israel as Iraqis."

Stein goes on to write about the Israeli political system, which, from the outset, it seems, was marred by accusations of corruption. The contentious issue of "Who is a Jew" also reared its ugly head early on, causing much inter-party conflict.

The author also discusses the "scourge of Arab infiltration" and the rise of Palestinian guerrilla terrorist attacks. Once again, Stein doesn't shy away from describing questionable Israeli deeds, such as the deliberate shooting down of a Syrian Airways airline in 1954.

Earlier that year, five Israeli soldiers on an intelligence-gathering mission had been captured in Syria. One of them committed suicide. The IDF forced the Syrian airliner to land in Israel and used the hostages as bargaining pawns to secure the release of the other captives in Syria. This was a public-relations disaster for Israel, who released the plane and passengers two days later.

Other chapters talk about the Sinai Campaign, the Cold War's effect on the Middle East and Israel's first prime minister David Ben-Gurion's controversial decision to buy arms from West Germany.

Israel's nuclear project, and American objection to it, reminds the reader of the current situation in Iran and North Korea and how, at times, Israel felt so isolated and treated not much differently than the "axis of evil" is today.

The last chapter of the book is dedicated to the events leading up to the Six Day War and the bold decision by Israel to launch a pre-emptive strike.

There is little left uncovered in this up-to-date and meticulously researched book. Anybody wanting a quick and easily understandable account of Israel's formative years will do well to read The Making of Modern Israel.

Peyton Manning wows 'Y' sports dinner

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — When the Rady JCC "Y" sports dinner committee took the elastic off the bankroll and decided to bring in Indianapolis Colts quarterback Peyton Manning as their featured speaker, there were more than a few naysayers who were concerned about the bottom line.

After all, the primary goal of the function is to raise funds for programs and services that enrich peoples' lives.

Well, advance sales of a record 1,600-plus tickets must have relieved the stress of some and also guaranteed that the evening would be a financial success.

How successful was the keynote speaker? Well, if the dinner was a football game, with Manning the signal caller, you could say he completed 31 of 35 passes for more than 400 yards and no interceptions.

Manning was greeted with a loud standing ovation when he was introduced and once again at the end of the evening when queries from the adoring audience had to be halted so the Winnipeg Convention Centre could be closed for the night.

The Yiddish term mensch would best describe Manning: very generous, good and down-to-earth.

Jeff Pash, executive vice-president of the NFL, who was guest of honour at the dinner, perhaps said it best: "Peyton symbolizes everything that is good about sports."

One reporter at a press conference 90 minutes prior to the dinner asked why Manning would come to Winnipeg except for the handsome fee he would earn.

The articulate Manning, with the cool demeanour he uses to handle charging tacklers, didn't bat an eyelash when he responded: "Growing up, my dad was my hero and my role model." (QB Archie Manning was a two-time NFL Pro Bowler who played from 1971 to 1984 with New Orleans, Houston, and Minnesota.)

"He always told me to have your priorities in order," Manning continued. "He encouraged us in sports but never pushed us. He didn't yell during our games at coaches and had a healthy passion for the game. As a person and a player, I haven't changed since I won the Super Bowl. And he also taught us that you have to give something back to the game.

"I was a communications major in college and my dad did a lot of public speaking and I enjoyed listening to him over the years. It served me well and I, too, have a charity [the PeyBack Foundation] that like the people here in Winnipeg also has a mission statement."

The audience participation later in the evening was impressive and well-schooled in the game south of the border.

When asked about Michael Vick, the Atlanta Falcons' QB jailed for promoting dog fighting, Manning handled the question sensitively. "I wish him the best and hope that he continues [to pursue] his dream. I do pull for quarterbacks. It's a unique fraternity."

Any QB, whether it be his father Archie, brother Eli of the Super Bowl-winning New York Giants, or himself, are all targets in the mayhem that is pro football. Is there anyone who is the most feared by Peyton?

"He's one of the best," Manning said. "He likes to use you while you're down on the ground to help himself get up."

Peyton pondered a question about the Blue Bombers' outlook, since more than 25 changes have been made to the team's lineup in the off-season.

"You can't just rush team chemistry," he explained. "There will definitely be a transition there. Teams that win have a close-knit relationship and it takes time. It's the same as in any business."

Manning also shared life lessons and leadership principles that apply to both sports and non-sports businesses. "You have to erase the bad plays and get back to zero. Don't dwell on the past. I set a rookie record for interceptions," he laughed.

"As a leader I put myself in a state of readiness. Do your part and encourage others to do the same," he added. "If you're leading the same way for five years it's not good. Change your style of leadership as things evolve. As tough as it is to get to the top, it's tougher to stay there."

Perhaps the last principle applies to the 'Y" dinner committee, in spades, since topping this year's fundraiser will take some doing.

Manning ended by lauding audience members for their support and the Rady Centre for the good work it does for the Winnipeg community.

The award for Jewish athlete of the year, presented at the dinner, went to Elizabeth Sera, who is attending the University of Western Ontario on an athletic scholarship. She participates in two of the roughest varsity sports, rugby and wrestling.

Rangers take Werek in NHL entry draft

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ethan Werek was getting a little antsy sitting in the Bell Centre, waiting to hear his name called during the recent 2009 NHL entry draft.

Then it happened. In the middle of the second round, the New York Rangers chose him 47th overall. NHL Central Scouting ranked him 32nd among North American skaters, so if you take into consideration Europeans and goalies, his placement was just about right.

"It was good," Werek said of finally being selected. "It was like a weight off my shoulders."

Speaking from New York, where he spent a week getting oriented and attending the Rangers' rookie development camp, he said "it's a great city. The organization itself has such great resources."

A 6-2, 195-pound forward with the Kingston Frontenacs of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL), Werek is known for his work ethic, his use of his body to fight for the puck and his ability to score goals. As an OHL rookie, he scored 32 goals and added 32 assists.

His coach at Kingston, Darren Keily, considers him a good pro prospect and Werek said he plans to "train hard" in preparation for the Rangers' camp at the end of the summer. Still, as an 18-year-old whose name is not Sydney Crosby, he realizes he'll probably be sent back to junior for more seasoning. "It's tough for an 18-year-old to crack the team," he said.

Still, he does have some of the professional player's off-ice characteristics already. Polite and considerate to a fault, he thanked his parents, Diane and Zeev, "for being there for me over the years."

He may not yet be ready for the Rangers, but he could probably go one on one with the CBC's Ron MacLean right now.

* * *

Werek is good friends with Daniel Erlich, a nifty skater with the London Knights. Both have Israeli heritage – Erlich's parents are Israeli, as is Werek's dad – and they've known each other for years.

Although he went undrafted, Erlich will attend the San Jose Sharks training camp this fall, Werek said.

Only 5-6 and 150 pounds, Erlich scored 18 goals and added 35 assists with the Knights in 2008-09. The right winger, who skated on a line with the Leafs' first-round pick, Nazem Kadri, during the playoffs, had 13 points in 14 post-season games.

Baycrest seeks volunteers for study on volunteering

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Healthy adults age 55 and over who aren't currently working or volunteering are being sought for a new study about volunteering being launched at Baycrest.

The Baycrest Research About Volunteering in Older Adults (BRAVO) pilot study, made possible with a grant from the government of Canada's New Horizons for Seniors program, is setting out to prove what many volunteers already know – that volunteering is an effective prescription for healthy aging.

Those who enrol in the study will receive mentoring and training in a volunteer position at Baycrest that best fits their values, experience and skill set.

Dr. Nicole Anderson, a scientist at Baycrest's Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Unit and lead investigator for the study, said her team will study participants before they begin volunteering and six months after they have volunteered.

"We're looking at the physical, cognitive and psychosocial benefits. Little has been done on the benefits of volunteering, and we believe that active seniors are less likely to develop dementia. Research has shown that people who volunteer are less depressed and more satisfied with life than others," Anderson said.

"The question, however, is whether the seniors who volunteer are healthier than others in the first place. It's a chicken-and-egg problem."

The study is exciting on its own, she said, but what really makes it "cool" is that it was developed and is being run by volunteers.

"It all came about when I spoke at volunteer appreciation week, and we decided we should conduct a study. We got together a group of volunteers who helped design the study, and we trained them to be research assistants," Anderson said.

"I wanted to keep busy when I stopped working, and because I had always worked with older people, I wanted to continue," Lidsky said.

> 'We believe that active seniors are less likely to develop dementia'

"My mother had been at Baycrest, and I was always impressed with the volunteers, so I started working in its creative arts department. It's an upbeat job, and the people I work with are lovely. It certainly adds to my week."

The study is important, she said, because it will show potential volunteers that it's a good way to maintain their emotional, intellectual and physical well-being. "It will give them something to think about."

Syrelle Bernstein, director of volunteer services at Baycrest is very excited about the study. "It is a wonderful opportunity to target potential volunteers and bring them into Baycrest. Not only would they be volunteers, they would be involved in research that benefits other seniors," she said.

"This project is what Baycrest is all about. People will learn about the exact thing I have been saying for years."

Bernstein said she welcomes the opportunity of speaking to groups about the project. For information, call 416-785-2500, ext. 2577.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

THE MAJESTIC GOEL TZEDEC

The Goel Tzedec, or University Avenue Synagogue, sits majestically on one of Toronto's major thoroughfares in this 1928 view. Situated on the east side of University Avenue between Dundas and Queen streets, the shul had a distinctive Romanesque exterior and could seat about 1,200. It was filled to overflowing on the High Holidays. Eventually the congregation merged with the McCaul Street Synagogue and became the present Beth Tzedec Congregation. Too fine to last, the synagogue served a large downtown congregation for nearly half a century and was torn down in 1955. (Courtesy Beth Tzedec Archives)

Is day school the answer?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I watch my son on Shabbat as he interacts with his cousins, aunt and uncle and friends. It is uplifting to witness his interest in family and the day of rest, its spirit and soul. Nowadays he will say to me, "Daddy can we sing Shalom Aleichem?" – the Friday night song that welcomes in this 25-hour oasis of time and space. Noah is now expressing a true toddler interest in our heritage.

As Noah grows, his mother and I are grappling with what to teach him about Judaism and how to teach it. As a child and young adult, I was exposed to an intense religious life and education, and despite the fact that I rejected that particular brand of Judaism, Torah knowledge and its ways are within me, and my choices were and are relatively informed ones.

If we don't impart to Noah the teachings of the Torah and Judaism, on some meaningful level, he will not have this same opportunity. That would be a shame.

In this context, one of the questions challenging us is where to send him to school. Do we want to invest in a Jewish day school education, which could cost over $100,000 by the time he graduates?

As we investigate the possibilities, we continually hear that a day school environment will ensure that he will have Jewish friends and exposure to Judaism in a wholesome way. We also hear the opposite.

Some students who started out in the day school system and eventually changed to public school told us they did not feel comfortable in their particular environment, were often made fun of for being "different" and regularly marginalized by the "hip" group.

It pains me to know the deep scars the day school system and environment have left on some of our young people who were uninterested in or unable to purchase the trendiest clothing, or quieter or less effusive than others. I wrote a series of articles on this topic last year (found in The CJN archives) examining the A and B lists in our day schools, and the effect this schoolyard hierarchy has on our children.

Recently, I met a young man who wended his way through the religious school system. He told me he had no intention of leading a comprehensive Jewish life and saw the day school system as a means to an end in terms of garnering a quality education.

I want Noah to grow up with a great respect for others, and love and appreciation of wisdom, knowledge, Torah and Judaism. With this in mind, we are searching to determine if our day schools impart these things, and together with parents, encourage curiosity and wonderment in the minds of our children, prompting them to consider "what Judaism has to say about…"

So what are we to do in regard to Noah's education? Is it worth it to send our child to Jewish day school so that he is surrounded by other Jews? I'm not sure. Is there any assurance that such an education will encourage a strong development and commitment to his Jewishness? This is unclear.

A Jewish day school education, with its high costs and Jewish thought as a basis for its curriculum, should strive for and achieve greatness and soulfulness. No doubt, many of our students have grown terrifically through their Jewish day school career, but are they the norm?

If day school was the Standard & Poor's, the investment barometer, of education, would you invest in it? Should we do so for Noah? The decision is not simple.

'Jewish Olympics' open in Israel

Maccabi Canada sends largest contingent ever

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Anybody who's ever been to the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games has raved about the experience – the pageantry, the celebration, the sense of Jewish solidarity.

Word gets around, and to satisfy the requests of athletes' family and friends who travelled to Israel for the Games, Maccabi Canada president Allen Gerskup came up with some 225 tickets. Many more made their own arrangements, and Gerskup, speaking before the team flew to Israel on a chartered El Al aircraft, said this reflects the favourable image of the Games and Israel.

The Games' brand in the Jewish community is much more positive and widespread than it was back in 1985, when Gerskup had his first exposure to the "Jewish Olympics" as manager of the men's softball team.

Tehran sanctions not a priority: Obama

L'AQUILA, Italy – The U.S. President, speaking at the G8 summit in Italy, said more sanctions against Tehran are not a priority.

Barack Obama said last Friday that the international community is "not going to just wait indefinitely" for Iran to renounce an interest in developing nuclear weapons.

Speaking at the G8 summit concluded in Italy, Obama stressed that he and others were not looking for their summit partners to embrace sanctions at this G8 meeting. Instead, he said that "what we wanted was exactly what we got" – a statement of condemnation about Iran's actions in the wake of its disputed presidential election.

Obama said G8 leaders voiced their concern about what he calls the "appalling" events surrounding the recent elections and the violence that followed. The leaders assembled at L'Aquila also addressed the threat of nuclear proliferation in Iran, he said, with a "strong statement" calling on Iran to fulfil its responsibilities without delay.

"This notion that we were trying to get sanctions or that this was a forum where we could get sanctions was not accurate," the president said.

"I think the real story here was consensus in that [G8] statement, including Russia, which doesn't make statements like that lightly," he said. "Now the other story there was the agreement that we will re-evaluate Iran's posture towards negotiating the cessation of a nuclear weapons policy

"We'll evaluate that at the G20 meeting in September," Obama said. "I think that what that does is it provides a time frame. The international community has said, 'Here's a door you can walk though that allows you to lessen tensions and more fully join the international community.'

The News in Brief

Canada

Dworkin Honoured

TORONTO — The late nurse and community worker Dorothy Dworkin was named a person of national historic significance last week. Jim Prentice, the minister responsible for Parks Canada, designated Dworkin on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monument Board of Canada. The Latvian-born Dworkin came to Canada with her family in 1904. She was a co-founder of Mount Sinai Hospital in Toronto, and she ran the city's free Jewish Dispensary and provided social services to immigrant Jews. Dworkin died in 1976 at age 86.

Crowds See Scrolls

TORONTO — More than 18,000 people viewed the Dead Sea Scrolls at the Royal Ontario Museum in their first nine days there, exceeding the museum's attendance projections for the exhibit by 52 per cent. Between June 27 and July 5, 18,324 visitors came to see the scrolls. They're on display until Jan. 3.

World

Researcher Dies

SAN FRANCISCO — Gary Tobin, a prominent Jewish researcher who challenged conventional Jewish wisdom, died at 59 July 6, after a long illness. Tobin, president of the Institute for Jewish & Community Research in San Francisco, was known for urging the community to be more open to converts as a viable way to grow Jewish numbers. As well, he was a fierce critic of the National Jewish Population Survey, claiming its methodology was flawed and that it undercounted U.S. Jews by more than one million. He also examined philanthropy and community diversity.

NYC Campaign Down

NEW YORK — America's largest Jewish federation said its 2008-09 fundraising drive dropped 11.5 per cent from the previous year. UJA-Federation of New York said it raised $136 million, down from $153.7 million. Despite the decrease, the federation said it was buoyed by its numbers. While the general campaign was down, it raised $215.3 million in total, including $60.5 million in planned giving and endowments, for an overall one per cent gain. Meanwhile, the umbrella group for the federation system, United Jewish Communities, said combined federation campaigns for 2008-09 were up 1.3 per cent over 2007-08, but total fundraising for the current year is off by 13 per cent.

Ex-Nazis Fit For Trial

BERLIN — A German court ruled July 7 that another former Nazi SS officer is fit to stand trial for war crimes. The decision by the regional high court in Cologne on Waffen-SS member Heinrich Boere, 88, came shortly after a German Supreme Court decision that Nazi guard John Demjanjuk, 89, is fit to face charges of assisting in the murder of more than 29,000 Jews. His trial is expected to start in the fall.

UJC Names New President

Jerry Silverman

NEW YORK — The umbrella organization of North America's Jewish federation system has hired Jerry Silverman, a key player in raising millions of dollars for Jewish summer camps, as its next president and CEO.

Silverman was tapped to head United Jewish Communities, the umbrella group of a federation system that raises and distributes about $3 billion annually from its general campaigns, endowments and special fundraising.

Since 2004, he has served as executive director of the Foundation for Jewish Camp, overseeing the growth of its budget from $1 million per year to more than $22 million.

A former high-level executive at Levi Strauss and Co. and Stride Rite Corp., Silverman succeeds Howard Rieger on Sept. 30, a month after Rieger's term as CEO ends.

At UJC, Silverman faces a series of challenges, starting with a shrinking budget and increasing questions about the need for a national system.

"I am going into this really clearly with my eyes open," he said. "I will be doing an inordinate amount of listening as we really look to put our agenda together."

Federation campaigns have been down or stagnating in recent years, a problem that has been exacerbated by the recession. Earlier this month, UJC officials said they project a 13 per cent decrease in the system-wide campaign this year, and the country's biggest federation, UJA-Federation of New York, said its campaign in 2008-09 was off by more than 11 per cent. The New York Federation typically brings in some $150 million annually.

JF&CS seeks 'professional' foster parents

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The nature of foster families is changing to meet the complex needs of children coming into care, says Sheryl Ederman, supervisor of children in care at Jewish Family & Child.

With a new emphasis on placing children who have straightforward needs with their extended families and immediate community whenever possible, she said, JF&CS is faced with the challenge of finding appropriate placements for children whose needs are more complex.

"This is where the notion of 'professional foster care' comes in. We are looking for people who are able to provide good, solid parenting, who understand the complexities of caring for foster children and who see it as a job," Ederman said.

"Foster families need to open their hearts, but they also need more than that. They need to accept a certain amount of change and challenge in their household."

It's not necessarily a full-time job, "but it is a job. There is a daily paid rate, and most expenses are paid."

Ederman said that kids do best in family-based care – there are currently 34 foster families in the Jewish community – and the agency's goal is to find homes in every area so that it can meet clients' social and cultural needs.

"We also support family access whenever it makes sense," she said.

"If we don't have enough homes, we have to place kids out of our system."

She said JF&CS needs homes for children of all ages, and foster parents can be any age and any family configuration. "We just placed a baby with a senior woman. We would love to support grandparenting."

Norm and Jody Roth have been married 25 years and have no children of their own. They've been fostering teenagers since 1996.

Jody, who can't remember exactly how many teens she and her husband have taken in over the years, said their door is open for time periods ranging from short-term "to a little longer.

"We're thrilled to have the kids keep up with us when they leave, but the onus is on them. We cry when they move out, but we're proud that they're moving on. It's almost like a graduation."

She said that they've learned to be friendly, "but not friends. We're there to provide guidance and support. I have training in early childhood education, but a lot of the training applies to the teens. They want attention and love, and they want to be guided."

The sun shines through in every case, she said. "If the kids have been a challenge, they know that we hung in there."

Norm stressed that "practically every kid has been great, and we can rely on the resources at JF&CS if we need support. When we get a child, we often have no information. We don't know who is in the house until we are faced with it.

"We went through [an initial] training period, we take part in ongoing training, and there is a lot of informal socializing between foster families."

Jody said they've built a basement apartment so they can provide some support for older teens, aged 18 or 19, who are getting ready to live independently.

"They need a family to help them through their transitional stage. They need a little 'TLC' and some mentoring."

Ederman wants to spread the word that "there are kids in our community who need care. To some people there is a stigma attached it, but there are problems out there, and [no one should be ashamed].

"There are a lot of invisible problems, and there are a lot of families who need help. We can't keep it a secret."

New 'heirloomed ground'

From the editor's desk...

The late, renowned Canadian poet A.M. Klein wrote a remarkably touching elegiac poem called Heirloom, in which he reflects upon his inheritance from his father. The reflection is triggered when the poet holds some holy books that had belonged to his father.

It is these holy books, the religion, background, customs, traditions and folkways they embody, the poet realizes, that comprise his true inheritance.

In achingly poignant language, Klein describes both the heartache and the esteem he feels as he examines his father's books.

He sets the mood with the opening stanza of the poem.

"My father bequeathed me no wide estates/ No keys and ledgers were my heritage/ Only some holy books with yahrzeit dates/ Writ mournfully upon a blank front page"

Klein wrote Heirloom some 70 years ago. The emotion it conveys is overwhelming. The insight it brings is worthy of the wisdom literature of our ancient sages. I return to the poem from time to time. It is a personal reminder that each one of us arrives at where we are in the arms, so to speak, of the many family members whom we knew and did not know.

I call Klein's poem to readers' attention because the importance of handing on to our children the things that were once precious to our parents seems to be less emphasized in these more atomized, more self-indulgent times. We are less attached to holy things in general, and specifically to our holy books, than our parents and grandparents were. We are less familiar with the long-cherished, long-fought-for particulars of our tradition than they were. That seems especially true, alas, of a large number of us, the children of the Jews who came to North America from Europe after World War II.

In truth, any prayer book or biblical sourcebook that we use is holy to us. My words are not intended to differentiate between or prefer one holy book over another. Indeed, Klein deliberately identifies the books in broad terms only, as "holy books."

But Klein's poem came immediately to mind when I recently received a copy of the newly published Koren Sacks Siddur (Koren Publishers Jerusalem Ltd.). It surely is a holy book.

Much has been written of the siddur, including in these pages, about the fact that it will "compete" with the ArtScroll Siddur for worshipper loyalty. Not enough, however, has been written of its sheer beauty and elegance as a text.

The siddur is a reissuing and a refining of the original, distinctive, all-Hebrew Koren Siddur first published in Israel in 1981. Eliahu Koren, the founder of the publishing house, was noted for the new, strikingly elegant Hebrew font he designed and for the meticulous layout of the prayers, according to the poetry and natural rests and breaks of their meaning.

The new siddur retains the iconic Koren font and inviting layout of the prayers but adds English-language translation, commentary and an overpowering introductory essay – "Understanding Jewish Prayer" – by Sir Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of the United Kingdom.

The essay is typical of Rabbi Sacks: lyrically written and deeply inspiring. Some 32 pages and 12 sections long, it informs and teaches the sophisticate and novice reader alike.

"Prayer is the language of the soul in conversation with God," Rabbi Sacks begins. "It is the most intimate gesture of the religious life and the most transformative... In prayer we speak to a presence vaster than the unfathomable universe, yet closer to us than we are to ourselves: the God beyond, who is also the Voice within. Though language must fail when we try to describe a Being beyond all parameters of speech, language is all we have, and it is enough."

If human language is inherently self-limiting, one would not know it by reading Rabbi Sacks' language.

The sweep of his essay is toward Heaven itself. It sets the emotional tone and intellectual content for the spiritual fulfilment that the esthetics and content of the siddur intend for the reader. His translations of the Hebrew liturgy and poetry are both accessible and majestic. His commentary is widely based and infused with the humility of his nature as well as the confidence that derives from his scholarship.

Unlike other bilingual prayer books, the English translation in the Koren Sacks Siddur is on the right-hand page. The Hebrew is on the left. The eye starts its course in the centre of the book, not at its edges, and then proceeds along the free, uncluttered course to the end of the page. The prayers run to the horizon, not into each other.

Klein concludes Heirloom by reaching toward the images and the memories of his father that the holy book in his hand evokes.

"And my tears, too, have stained this heirloomed ground/ When, reading in these treatises some weird Miracle, I turned a leaf and found/ A white hair fallen from my father's beard."

With the publication of the Koren Sacks Siddur, we have possibly new terrain that may one day be the heirloomed ground for generations to come.

THREE YEARS AFTER THE SECOND LEBANON WAR

Last week on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem, an official memorial ceremony was held for the soldiers who fell in battle in the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006. Defence Minister Ehud Barak, pictured laying a wreath, praised the conduct of combat troops. "The soldiers and commanders in the field showed courage, resourcefulness and camaraderie... Their daring made up for the mistakes of the top ranks more than once," Barak said. "It has only been three years, a mere blink in historical terms, but it seems like it has been ages upon ages. The Second Lebanon War lies in the collective Israeli conscious, an eye-opening jolt. One fact transcends all the polemics and criticism – the IDF's soldiers headed out to this mission knowing what the home front knew as well – that we must respond."

Scholarship helps newcomers further their education

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Newcomers to Canada can get some help with their post-secondary education, thanks to a scholarship from Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto's (JIAS) Shindman/ShaRna Foundation.

Scholarships are available to JIAS clients of any age – they must be here less than five years – who are enrolled in an Ontario post-secondary educational program.

Romm Gurel, a JIAS community worker, said the agency has been distributing scholarships through the Shindman Foundation, based on merit and financial need, for about 30 years.

In 2006, Sharon Weintraub, head of Sha Rna, a philanthropic foundation, began contributing to the scholarships so that the organization could help out more students.

Janis Roth, JIAS executive director, said in a letter that this year, "when the scholarship endowment did not provide any interest for scholarships, [Weintraub] provided outright the usual annual amount of $10,000, plus $30,000 more to ensure every eligible applicant received a grant."

Twelve scholarships were awarded in 2006, Gurel said, 19 were awarded in 2008, and this year there were 24 recipients.

"This past year the total amount of scholarships given was $40,800, an increase from last year's $36,000 total sum. Although the foundation has been very generous, we are giving less money to more people due to a growing need," he said.

Weintraub said that many immigrants need to upgrade their qualifications or find new professions when they arrive here.

"Any profession [such as pharmacy, medicine, dentistry or law] that is [licensed] requires retraining, and then students have to pass a set of exams. It's a tremendous effort, and if the students have a family to support, it can be difficult."

During these tough economic times, she said, they're trying to help as many people as possible. "Some of the younger students come from families in which both parents are unemployed. Some are exceptional students, but they spent a few years catching up with their English. They need a little help moving forward."

She shared a letter from one recipient who plans to pursue a career in management accounting. "Thanks to the Shindman/ShaRna Foundation I am one step closer to that goal.

"By awarding me the [scholarship] you have lightened my financial burden, which allows me to focus more on [school]. Your generosity has inspired me to help others and give back to the community."

Another recipient, a lawyer, received a scholarship that helped him get Canadian certification. "I wrote the last of 13 exams, for which I had to pay $2,100. The scholarship was helpful in covering [some of] the cost of the exams."

Weintraub said the application process begins in February each year, and the process is completed by mid-April. "This year we had 30 applications and were able to accept 24."

Weintraub is glad that she has been able to help expand the program. "JIAS needs more supporters, especially during this economic downturn. I'd like to see even more people become employable.

"These newcomers all want jobs. They just need a little assistance to get them where they want to be."

Fun, fellowship and peoplehood

The logo of the 18th Maccabiah Games, inset, contains a reference in Hebrew that is, as CJN columnist and educator Rachael Turkienicz has pointed out in other contexts, "both descriptive and prescriptive." Below the English word Maccabiah is the same word in Hebrew. Alongside of it, however, also in Hebrew, is the tiny, yet always evocative, two-letter word chai.

The placement of chai beside Maccabiah is more than a felicitous design statement. It is a purposeful, proclamatory double entendre.

As every Jew on earth knows, the word chai is also the numerological equivalent of the number 18. Hence, the descriptive use of the word in the logo to capture the fact that the upcoming Games are the 18th in the series of Games that began in 1932.

But as every Jew on earth also knows, chai means life.

It is in reference to this meaning of the word that its placement in the logo is prescriptive: These are the 18th Maccabiah Games. The Maccabiah Games live!

The designer of the logo and the organizers of the games clearly intended to pack this double punch. In this context, the Games are a symbol for the Jewish state itself and for its relationship to the Jewish people throughout the world.

Athletes from more than 60 countries have been in Israel since before July 13, when the games officially began. The competitions last until July 23.

In speaking of the 18th Maccabiah Games, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said they're an instrument for uniting the Jewish people. "Jews come here from all over the world for athletic competitions which both embody the idea of 'a healthy soul in a healthy body' and strongly link the Diaspora communities with the State of Israel in the Land of Israel."

Using history and occasion as a jumping off point to the central themes of athletics, fellowship and peoplehood, Oded Grofman, the consul for tourism and director of the Israel Government Tourist Office – Canada, added, quite neatly, the very pragmatic observation that the Games will be fun, too. The culminating ceremony will be a massive beach party, with the Tel Aviv-Yafo beach strip decorated according to the different nationalities of the athletes.

"This year's competition will add some extra excitement to Tel Aviv's summer-long centennial festivities," Grofman said.

The outcome of the athletic competitions are quite secondary to the overarching significance of the Games, which is to act as a potent reminder of the double-sided, life-affirming, hope-sustaining fact: The State of Israel lives. The Jewish people lives!

Urges community to unite for Israel

The recent academic conference at York University – "Israel Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace" – was just another ploy to delegitimize the Jewish state ("Ottawa reviews funding for York U conference," CJN Toronto, June 18; also see "York conference on Israel met by protests," CJN website, July 9).

In response to the conference, protests were organized by Hasbara@York, Hasbara Fellowships and the Canadian Centre for Israel Activism and the Jewish Defence League. I am not aware of any other Jewish organizations that were involved in protests. Where was the Jewish community? Our enemies are relentless in their effort to demonize and delegitimize Israel by broadcasting half-truths, telling outright lies and presenting a revisionist historical narrative. They advocate boycotts, send letters to the editors, stage plays, show films, hold seminars and conduct "educational" weeks and rallies, the result of all of which is to slowly brainwash the public and the university students who will become the future leaders of Canada.

In some cases, it has become unsafe for speakers who are pro-Israel to speak out on university campuses. The true story of Israel is rarely told to the public at large. We generally tell the story only at synagogues.

Why is it that we have funds to build great buildings but not enough to protect our survival? Why is it that we keep concentrating on the minor differences in viewpoints between our different organizations instead of concentrating on the major objectives that we have in common? The organizations that care about Israel and focus on fighting anti-Semitism should be able to find a common ground to work together. We are too few in number to allow ourselves the luxury of splintering over minor ideological differences. We who love Israel have to wake up and unite along our common purpose: the survival of the State of Israel.

York U situation in need of repair

The headline of Eric Lawee's article urges us to "curb the hyperbole" about the institution where he teaches, and to try to retain our sense of balance about what's been happening there ("Let's curb the hyperbole about York," CJN, July 2).

Will do! On one side of the balance sheet, there is all the really positive stuff he mentions: the Holocaust and anti-racism program; the annual invitation extended to an Israeli academic who takes "students beyond the screaming headlines" and who serves as a human "antidote" to all types of propaganda, and not only of the anti-Israel variety (although one has to wonder if that's rather a heavy burden to place on the shoulders of one little Israeli); the "vibrancy" of York University's Hillel, and the "complex" and "dynamic" campus.

Which brings us, alas, to the other side of the balance sheet: hosting an absurd conference that lent an academic gloss to the "one-state solution," that is, Israel's extinction; participating in Israeli Apartheid Week, an annual global event of shadowy origin that purveys lies, smears and blood libels about the Jewish state with the aim of making Israel's demise a moral necessity; a long list of professors who push the Marxist/Islamist line about Israel being an alien colonialist, imperialist "occupier"; a university administration that seems at a loss at how to deal with "the screaming demonstrators who too often populate York's Vari Hall"; a campus awash in splenetic Jew-hate/anti-Zionism such that Jewish students (some of whom I have spoken to personally) are afraid to identify themselves as Zionists. Some of these students were recently forced to barricade themselves in a classroom and await police rescue, because some of their more "complex" and "dynamic" campus-mates seemed intent on throttling them.

So by all means, let's tally up the balance sheet. And after we do, let's be honest enough to admit that something at York is seriously out of whack and in desperate need of repair.

Expects zero tolerance of hate at York U

The article by Eric Lawee outlines some of the many accomplishments of Jews at York University, ranging from its strong Jewish presence and excellence in Jewish studies to its excellent relationship with Israeli academics and its well-supported Hillel ("Let's curb the hyperbole about York," CJN, July 2). But he totally misses the point. His argument is that because of the many positives involving Jews at York University, the Jewish community should not be so quick or angry in its condemnation of anti-Jewish activities at York. The point is: we expect all of those positives from a leading academic institution, and we expect that there will be zero tolerance for the promotion of hate, intolerance and anti-Semitic behaviour at York. It is not one or the other, it is both. And if the Jewish community does not believe that both are mandatory, why should we expect the greater community to do so?

'We should think big about our goals'

(Excerpted from Natan Sharansky's acceptance speech as chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel, on June 25 in Jerusalem)

Being elected the chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency is not only a great honour and challenge, it is also the closing of a very large circle, a circle which started many years ago in Moscow, when we were ordinary loyal Soviet Jews – which meant we were deprived of our freedom and our identity and were powerless and helpless.

We discovered there is the State of Israel, which fights for its right to exist and also for our dignity, a state which is waiting for us. Then we discovered that there is a great history, which started with the Exodus of the Jews from Egypt and continues – and we are part of this exodus. Then we discovered that we are a part of great people whose solidarity, whose struggle will be always with us. That is when we began to fight for our freedom.

That is why, when the judge, some minutes before sentencing me, asked me, "What are the last words which you want to say to the court?" I told him: "I have nothing to say to the court, but to my people and to my wife I am saying "L'shanah ha'bah b'Yerushalayim, next year in Jerusalem." I said it because I knew that this is what connects me with the generations of Jews before, and with those Jews who had been fighting for me all these years.

Let me take you for a second to the prison thousands of miles from Jerusalem and from Moscow, to Ural, on the border of Siberia. There I was in the solitary confinement and near me in the other cell was another Jew, another Prisoner of Zion, Yosef Mendelevitz, also in solitary confinement. We couldn't talk to one another, but we could signal in Morse code.

We could not see one another on what we believed was Independence Day in Israel, at the time which we believed was 11 o'clock in Jerusalem, the time the siren goes off. We looked, we stood still together and looked in the direction of Jerusalem. We heard the siren and we saw the people of Jerusalem standing in the streets. We heard the voice of [then-Israeli prime minister] Menachem Begin promising that they will never stop fighting until we will be released. We knew that the whole Jewish world was united in the struggle. And we knew that the day will come and the airplane will come and will take us from that prison to Israel.

That day came for me five years later. Then, one after the other, all the other Prisoners of Zion were released, and then, as the result of 25 years of the struggle of all Jewish people, millions of Jews were able to leave the Soviet Union. That was the power of this connection with Israel, with Jerusalem and with the Jewish people.

Today we live in a much better world, a world where there are no walls or prisons standing between us. We can talk to our friends all over the world in real time and even see them.

Yet, why are we so lonely? Why are we so weak in facing external threats? We are not in solitary confinement. We live in big communities, the great community of the State of Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora. But these communities look like they are running in different directions. Is there a way to change the world? Is there an organization that can do it?

Great ideas change the course of history. Ideas inspire people, mobilize their commitment, their energy, their talents. Then an organization unites these people and their talents and this energy and so history can be changed. That is what happened more than 100 years ago when Theodor Herzl came up with a simple idea. He said the time has come to translate our great prayers and dreams and desires into a political act to build the State of Israel.

But his was not only an idea. He created an organization – the Zionist Organization. It became clear that it was not enough to have a small group of people who want to come to Palestine to build the State of Israel. You have to unite the forces of the whole Jewish world, and so the Jewish Agency was created.

Israel was built long before the state was declared. Before and after the declaration, the Jewish Agency brought millions of Jews in many different waves, and the state was developed.

Today we are in a different world with different challenges. We are in what I call the world of post-identity. Today, for many people in the free world, any connection to their religion, to their people, their roots or their history seems like something which goes against the principles of freedom. In this world of post-identity, we Jews are especially in danger because of assimilation and the weakening of the connection to our roots and to our tradition.

One of the principle aims of the Jewish Agency was and will be aliyah to Israel. But how do you bring an oleh from America or from France or England if you are not strengthening their identification with the Jewish people. This is our greatest challenge.

We see, for example with Birthright [Israel trips for young people], that if you want to strengthen Jewish identity of Jews of the Diaspora, you need Israel. But we also see that if you want to strengthen the Jewish identity of Israelis, you need the Diaspora.

Where is the organization uniting this effort? Where is the organization in which Israel and the Diaspora meet and build projects together? There is only one organization in all the big world of Jewish organizations where the State of Israel and Jews of the Diaspora are in constant dialogue and are constantly working together. That is our organization, the Jewish Agency…

We should speak big and think big about our goals. Our aim should be no less than to make sure that Jewish Zionist education is available to every Jew in the world. It is a difficult task, but it is possible. Not only should Jewish Zionist education be available, it should be desirable, in demand, it should be cool, as my daughters say.

The Jewish Agency can do it. It should be done through the strength of our bond with the State of Israel. Important decisions should be made together. Important questions, which are discussed here, should also be discussed at the government meetings and in the hearings in the committees of the Knesset.

Now let's go back to that moment in Soviet prison. I stood silent in honour of Israel's Independence Day. I felt such a close connection with all the Jews of the world. I have to say that I remember that moment, often nowadays, especially when I travel to campuses. (In the last six years, I visited 70 universities all over the world, 50 of them in the United States of America and 20 mainly in Europe.)

The college campus is one of the most challenging places today for us as a people. It is a place where our youth are under constant pressure to be ashamed of and distanced from their people and their country.

The first question I was asked by a young, talented Jewish student on the very first campus I visited – a question repeated again and again – was: "Explain to me why we need Israel. Tikkun olam means justice for everybody. So let us work for justice for everybody."

I told him: "Ask your parents how the world looked when there was no Israel." I could have explained about Jews who left their heritage and went on to make a revolution. But we in the Soviet Union did the opposite. We went back to our roots, back to our identity to fight for our freedom. And in this way we helped fight for freedom all over the world.

The most important challenge for all of us is to make sure that this student at Columbia University, or that student at Berkley, or a young couple in Sderot or Jews of Venezuela or Kiev – that they all feel themselves empowered by this connection to the Land of Israel, to the State of Israel, by the connection to Jerusalem, by their pride for our history and for our tradition.

In this post-identity world, if there are strong, vibrant Jewish families united around Jerusalem and the State of Israel, then our lives will be meaningful and we will be able to fulfil the mission for which we are chosen as a people: to do tikkun olam, to make our world a better place.

Opinions

Where are the Jewish Susan Boyles?

On April 11, a frumpy looking 47-year-old woman named Susan Boyle auditioned for the TV show Britain's Got Talent. She took the stage to condescending glances. However, by the time she finished singing, she got a standing ovation, and within hours, she was an international sensation. Boyle was an exceptional singer whose talent had been overlooked for decades.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Boyle's story reminds us of how often talent gets wasted. And the question the Jewish community must ask itself is this: where are the Jewish Susan Boyles?

The culture of Torah scholarship was once anti-elitist. The Talmud is filled with tales of outsiders who became rabbis. For example, Reish Lakish was a common criminal who was invited into the world of Torah by the leading rabbi of his time, Rabbi Yochanan. The rabbis of the Talmud saw enormous potential in every human being and insisted on opening the door to "non-traditional students."

Another talmudic passage tells a cautionary tale about elitism. The great rabbi, Hillel, was a poor woodchopper who would scrounge his pennies to pay admission for the study hall. One winter day, Hillel didn't have any money and was turned away by the guard. Hillel tried to listen to the lecture though a window and nearly froze to death. Luckily, the rabbis saw him through the window and saved his life.

This passage has a simple message: if you barricade the doors to the study hall, you'll leave great rabbis such as Hillel out in the cold.

Today, unknown Jews without status are also left out in the cold. Some are excluded because of money, finding it difficult to pay day school tuitions and synagogue memberships. Others feel excluded by Jewish institutions that are so insular and unwelcoming that when an outsider wanders in, they are made to feel like an intruder.

And I hear all too often about Jews who are alienated from the Jewish community because they are treated with coldness and condescension.

Our community has been exploring many expensive and exotic ways to ensure Jewish continuity. But a critical element in solving the problem of Jewish continuity is free: we simply need to make our institutions more welcoming. We need to say hello to visitors and include them in our community. We need to invite in the Susan Boyles and make them feel at home. Who knows? Maybe we'll be welcoming in the next generation's Hillel.

If we are searching for the Jewish Susan Boyles, finding them is simple: they are at the entrance of every Jewish institution, waiting for someone to smile and open the door.

Yes we can Zionism

I recently attended a plenary session at a major Zionist organization. The plenary was off the record, so I won't identify the organization. Some speakers invoked "Obama's way" as a model, marvelling at the extraordinary fundraising and community-building network that U.S. President Barack Obama and his people developed during the 2008 campaign.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Yes, we can learn a lot from Obama and company's networking skills. But we must remember that much of the magic of the moment came from Obama's message. Without a clear vision, without a compelling and positive message, all the networking skills in the work won't revitalize Zionism – or modern Judaism.

Obama's "Yes, We Can" slogan captured the sense of hope, renewal, youth that Obama's network then spread so effectively. Embedded in his positive "Yes, we can" messaging was a "No, we are not" message too. The dynamics of the Democrats' successful 2008 campaign began as a reaction against then-president George W. Bush and the Republicans. But Obama's marketing genius was to transform that negative into a positive.

Especially in our apathetic, distracted society, people often react more to negative stimuli than to positive stimuli. Usually, terrifying headlines about disasters or failures grab our attention. But in our happy-dappy, entertainment-addicted society, we don't want to dwell in that negative space.

A great leader – and shrewd marketer – builds momentum off fear to fulfil longings and achieve something positive. I would say that one of the weakest and most worrying aspects of Obama's initial approach to foreign policy is that he is too stuck in his "No, we are not" George W. Bush counter-reaction phase and has not yet shaped a positive foreign policy vision that fits the world's ugly realities while moving forward.

The struggle between the negative and the positive looms as a central challenge for the modern Zionist movement, too. During the "good old days" of the 1990s, when Israel flourished economically and seemed headed for peace, most Diaspora Jews ignored Israel. When the Palestinians rejected the Oslo peace process and turned to terror, all of the sudden, many Jews began rallying around Israel. Too many "Israel advocates" are caught in the cat-and-mouse game against the ugly alliance of amoral moralizers linking the left with pro-Palestinian forces, especially on campus. The fight galvanizes, but ultimately it distracts and demoralizes.

We must evolve away from our sorry situation, which makes the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and his fellow Palestinian terrorists – of Hamas, Hezbollah and Fatah – the most effective tools for raising Jewish and Zionist consciousness. Like Obama during his campaign, we should build momentum from the "No, we are not." We should say, "No, we are not deluded by the politically correct cant that demonizes Israel, that singles out Israel. No, we are not swayed by the distorted reasoning that rationalizes Palestinian terrorism and excuses Palestinian – and Islamist – authoritarianism, sexism, racism, homophobia and anti-Semitism."

But as we build our networks we must master our messaging. We should say "Yes, we can" to Zionism, not just as a movement of national self-preservation to protect us against the Israel bashers' one-sidedness, disproportionality, anti-Semitism and irrationality. We should say "Yes, we can" to a Zionism of hope and of vision, of individual and collective fulfilment. We should say "Yes, we can" to a Zionism that uses Jewish history, Jewish nationalism, and the extraordinary opportunity of building a modern democratic Jewish state to answer our deepest existential needs.

"Yes, we can" have a Zionist revolution about inspiration. "Yes, we can" look at Israel and the Jewish national project as vehicles for finding meaning, values, a sense of mission in the world today. "Yes, we can" have a Zionist movement that invites us in, saying we are so lucky to be living in this historical moment, when by spending time in Israel, learning about Israel, viewing the world through a Zionist lens, we can grow as individuals, but remember that humans flourish best and accomplish the most when they're rooted in enduring values, and when they're working, building, and dreaming together in larger frameworks that pull us beyond ourselves without sacrificing our selves.

Lessons from my mother, Part 2

It seems that I hit a chord when I wrote in my May column about how I'm trying to spiritually deal with my mother's growing dementia. I received many e-mails and phone calls thanking me for discussing the spiritual side of caring for aging parents.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Toronto

One person wrote: "I've gotten plenty of medical and cognitive suggestions, and even information about 'caring for the caregiver' groups. But no one so far has helped me see that through it all, both I and my mother remain full human beings, body and soul, still linked spiritually and still relating as neshamas one to the other."

With that in mind, allow me to share five additional spiritual lessons I'm learning that help me keep my dignity – and hers, too – as the mother I once had slips away.

• Don't talk down. She isn't a baby, even though sometimes it feels as if she is. Yes, keep it simple, but you aren't talking to a five-year-old, so don't use that "mommy modulation" that makes your voice squeaky and cutesy. You're still an adult, and somewhere inside her there is still an adult, too.

• Get to know the other people in the nursing home and their families. Sometimes it's just too much to sit alone with my mom, so it's a relief to bring others into the conversation. It helps me stay positive when I offer a smile to the other folks sitting around waiting for visitors. Their happiness at being acknowledged rubs off on me, and then onto my mother.

• Some of the folks in the home may seem downright nasty at times (or maybe your parent does.) I'd be nasty, too, if I was ill, frail, fed mashed up food, washed and changed by a person I didn't know, confined, not able to express myself, and not able to go where I wanted when I wanted. I try to figure out why someone scowls. Maybe she doesn't speak English. Maybe he thinks I'm his daughter who never visits. Maybe she had a bad dream last night. Or maybe he's hungry and the nurse hasn't fed him yet. I smile at them anyway.

• Don't romanticize. Your parent wasn't perfect before they got dementia. You fought, you disagreed, you got frustrated, and so did they. There will be bad days, just like before they got ill. There will be good memories, but also bad ones. Memories are all we get, so put the sad ones together with the joyous ones, and hopefully it will balance out.

• If you need to cry, cry. You can admit that you feel sorrow. You don't always need to be brave. But remember that your life isn't over, and neither is theirs. There is still a divine spark in them, and you're the one who helps to keep it shining. Your loved one doesn't want you to descend into the depths where they go, into the darkness they sometimes feel, or into the unnamed places in their minds to which they sometimes wander. But they definitely want you there when they come back.

Oscar Wilde wrote, "Memory is the diary that we all carry about with us." Sometimes I think my mother is writing new pages, and sometimes I think she's re-living old ones. Many times the diary is closed shut, and even locked. But it helps me to know that I, and the rest of my family – as well as the tremendous accomplishments of her life, the little triumphs and setbacks, and daily loving and living – are all in there, held in her heart, even if she can't retrieve them now.

The Kirshner File

Yariv Mozer was walking to the Cinematheque – a landmark in central Tel Aviv – to watch an Israeli film when his cellphone rang

It was July 2006 and the Second War in Lebanon was approaching its climax. "I won't forget this moment," said Mozer, who was then a captain in the reserves and is now a major. "It was not the kind of a call you get every day."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The caller was his commanding officer, the proprietor of a carpet store in Ramat Gan – a Tel Aviv suburb – in peacetime.

"He said, 'I need an officer now.'" Mozer was asked to replace a man who had left his unit prematurely due to anxiety attacks.

Mozer was rattled by the sudden turn of events, not quite able to reconcile the business-as-usual mood in Tel Aviv with the war in Lebanon, which seemed unreal, like a mirage.

Compared to the hustle and bustle of Tel Aviv, life in northern Israel had ground to a complete standstill as deadly barrages of Hezbollah rockets forced tens of thousands of Israeli civilians into bomb shelters.

Amid a swirl of emotions, Mozer asked his commanding officer whether he could return his call in five minutes.

He needed time to think and call his parents, Giora and Chana.

As he departed for the trip north, Mozer – a documentary filmmaker – slung a rifle around his shoulder and took his video camera along.

He had no intention of making a film about the war. "It never crossed my mind," he said.

He regarded the camera as a psychological instrument to calm himself down and separate himself from the reality of war.

The raging conflict in Lebanon would be his first war as a soldier. During the late 1990s, he had served in southern Lebanon, but his unit had not come under fire.

But now, in the summer of 2006, it appeared quite likely that Mozer would be thrown into the thick of battle.

A munitions officer, he spent several weeks on the front, and, with the permission of the army, he filmed what interested him.

He shot 10 hours of footage, all inside Israel, and only realized that he had material for a film once the war had ended.

He was free to film whatever he liked on the understanding that he would submit footage to censors for final approval.

"For the army, this was a difficult film. We had long negotiations," said Mozer.

He agreed to blur maps, alter vital numbers and delete a few inflammatory words from soldiers' critiques of the army's handling of the war.

Mozer's film, My First War, had its Canadian premiere at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival. Channel 1 in Israel broadcast it on July 12, the third anniversary of the outbreak of the war. The 82-minute film has already been screened on Israel's documentary television channel and by TV stations throughout Europe. The French-language service of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation aired it recently.

My First War, Mozer's debut as a director, opens in an Israeli army encampment near a plum orchard close to the Lebanese border, and resounds to the sound of strife and fury.

Keeping his camera snugly tied around his neck with a shoelace, Mozer filmed tanks firing shells and launchers firing missiles, tracing smoky arcs in the clear blue sky.

Shifting away from this scene of desolation, he panned on neatly piled artillery shells waiting to be used by gunners.

Mozer, 31, supported the war, which broke out after Hezbollah ambushed an Israeli patrol inside Israeli territory, killing several soldiers and kidnapping two others.

"I believed that if a government takes a decision to go to war, it knows what it is doing," explained Mozer, who was raised in a Labor Zionist milieu by parents who both served in the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency. "I trusted the government."

But as the war dragged on, with the Israeli armed forces unable to suppress the rain of Hezbollah rockets on northern communities, Mozer had second thoughts.

"Day after day, we were stuck in the same position, as if there was no meaning to this war," he said.

To convey the inconclusive character of the conflict, Mozer talked to disillusioned soldiers, who expressed disappointment and anger. "They reflected my fears and anxieties," he explained.

Much of My First War is composed of such revealing snippets.

A lieutenant colonel finds the war frustrating because Israel's high command is stymied by Hezbollah's ability to launch rockets at Israel with impunity. Another officer claims that soldiers died in vain.

Mozer, in the film, bitterly describes the war as "useless," and adds, "I have an undeniable feeling of defeat."

In an interview in Toronto, he said, "I knew that something was completely wrong with this war. It was as if I was waking up from an illusion."

My First War, in this pointed spirit, questions the competence of Israel's vaunted army.

"I assumed that the army would be organized, though I knew from experience that it is not so organized," said Mozer. "I thought everything would fall into place once the war began, but I was wrong."

In line with his view, the generals in charge of the war are mercilessly skewered and compared unfavourably with heroic foot soldiers.

The troops that he interviewed received conflicting orders. As one soldier vocally complains, "The orders are crazy."

Still other soldiers refer to a lack of clarity on the part of political and military leaders to formulate strategy.

Mozer is particularly critical of the order that sent 33 soldiers to their deaths in the final 48 hours of the 34-day war.

The film also conveys the impression that troops were inadequately protected from incoming fire.

Soldiers who camp out on cots in an exposed orchard are depicted as "sitting ducks." In Kibbutz Kfar Giladi, the corpses of a dozen soldiers who were struck down by missiles in an open field are covered with blankets.

Mozer has no qualms in acknowledging that Hezbollah fighters acquitted themselves well.

"The fighting is tough," says a weary soldier. And in a grudgingly admiring reference to Hezbollah's talent for stealth, he observes, "They're like ghosts. We're like mice." A captain adds that Hezbollah fighters are disciplined.

"From all I heard, we fought a very well-trained army with strong motivations and values," said Mozer.

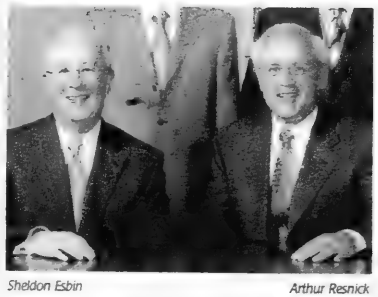
Although he considers Israel the pre-eminent power in the Middle East, he believes that Israel lost the war due to its failure to achieve its overarching objective – silencing Hezbollah's missile batteries.

In retrospect, he feels that Israel should not have rushed into war and should have called a truce sooner. "We need to be wiser, not stronger, than Hezbollah. And we need to talk to them. We should consider diplomacy before war."

Fleshing out this theme, he mused, "To promote peace and dialogue, you should talk to your enemy. And if this is not possible, deal with your enemy wisely and don't give him the satisfaction of dragging you into a war."

Since My First War, Mozer has worked on 10 documentaries as a producer. Currently, he is directing his second film, a profile of Israel's Jewish-Arab duet at this year's Eurovision Song Contest, Achinoam Nini and Mira Awad.

Meet Shelly and Arthur, Romspen Mortgage Managers



Sheldon Esbin Arthur Resnick

Shelly and Arthur have been managing commercial first mortgages on behalf of investors for most of their lives. Two things have never failed:

1. Investor returns have never been less than 8.4% per annum
2. Investors have never missed receiving their monthly payment

There are many good reasons why the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund has grown to be the largest private mortgage fund in Canada. Learn all about it and meet the people who manage the Fund at our next monthly Investor Seminar. Financial advisors are welcome.

Couple opens non-religious Jewish private school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In September, Robyn Hochglaube and her husband Kevin Gandy are opening the type of school they couldn't find for their own young children.

Wentworth Preparatory School is the city's "first private school with a Jewish perspective," say the couple, who are also directors of Camp Green Acres, a Toronto-area day camp.

As of September, it will be housed at Temple Sinai, according to the school's website.

Wentworth Prep – as in its website name wentworthprep.com – is not a parochial school, said Hochglaube, a native of Montreal who attended Jewish People's Schools & Peretz Schools there.

"We want the culture of Jewishness, but we want the focus to be academic," Hochglaube told The CJN.

She will serve as school administrator for the foreseeable future, while Gandy, an accountant, will take more of a behind-the-scenes role, dealing with financing, fundraising and outdoor education.

The new school, which will charge tuition of $11,000 for full-day junior kindergarten, will not offer instruction in religion, but it will provide a Hebrew-language component.

Children will also celebrate Shabbat and learn about Jewish holidays, while non-religious Jewish content will be embedded in the general curriculum, Hochglaube said.

"It's not the focus of the school [that will be Jewish]. It's more the environment of the school… The concept is that the Jewish community should have a private school to compete with the Upper Canada Colleges, the Havergals and the Bishop Strachans."

Daily physical education classes and outdoor education will be a major component of the curriculum, Hochglaube and Gandy said. Among other possible excursions, they plan to bus students to Green Acres once a month for "experiential learning," said Gandy.

French language instruction will begin in Grade 2, but Spanish will start earlier, in junior kindergarten, and will feature more prominently, because Canadians do more business with Spanish-speaking countries, according to Hochglaube.

She said that her son would have gone to a Jewish day school, but that a bad experience dealing with the administration before classes even started changed their plans.

Wentworth Prep is open to both Jewish and non-Jewish students, who will learn the same Jewish content as their peers, she said. "We want them to be global citizens."

Hochglaube, who studied economics and has an MBA, began meeting with representatives of established private schools two years ago to understand how they started. She said she was heartened to learn that it wasn't uncommon to start in rented spaces with as few as half a dozen students.

As of last week, she had five students enrolled for the fall, and two teachers on staff.

Hochglaube also met with Bryan Keshen of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who shared demographic and statistical data about Toronto's Jewish community with her when the school was in the early planning stages.

Keshen – then the federation's vice-president of strategic planning, and now executive director of the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre and the Schwartz-Reisman Community Centre – told The CJN recently that Toronto's Jewish community has "a great number of people interested in identifying Jewishly, but not necessarily religiously."

Hochglaube said the school hasn't looked into being affiliated with the federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education ("the Mercaz"), which is currently regrouping after a major reorganization that saw its staff cut by about two-thirds.

The school – whose name, Hochglaube said, is a "strong, English old-school type of name" and also the name of a street in a Jewish area of her native Montreal – is starting with junior kindergarten through Grade 2, but the goal is to eventually provide education through high school.

Yehezkel Shabtai may be your Air Canada pilot to Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Few Canadians travel to Israel as often as Yehezkel Shabtai.

On average, he flies to Israel 20 times a year. Since 1994, he has flown to Israel numerous times.

Duty calls him to Israel, where he was born and raised.

Shabtai, 55, an Air Canada captain based in Toronto, has been flying the Tel Aviv route about twice a month since 2005.

He may be your pilot the next time you fly to Israel.

Shabtai, who joined Air Canada in 1979, began flying to Israel in 1994.

With 20,000 flying hours behind him and a captain since 1999, he is one of Air Canada's most experienced pilots.

In addition to Israel, he flies to destinations in Europe, including London, Paris, Frankfurt and Rome. He used to fly to Asia as well.

Depending on weather conditions, he takes the northern or southern route to Israel. On the northerly route, he flies past Gander, over Ireland, Norway or Poland and then on to Greece and Cyprus before landing at Ben-Gurion Airport.

On the southerly route, he passes St. John's or New York City, heads past the Azores islands and southern Europe before landing in Israel.

"It doesn't matter which route we take," he said. "Everything is computerized."

On taking off from Pearson International Airport, Shabtai uses manual controls. In 90 per cent of cases, he also lands manually. Once airborne, he depends on a cruise control system to guide the aircraft, a Boeing 767, which holds about 211 passengers and a crew of 11, including three pilots.

"We monitor the weather, flying conditions, airplane systems and talk to control agencies along the way."

As for jet lag, he said, "We all suffer from it, but we deal with it."

On the 10-1/2-hour flight to Israel, he has time to rest, sleeping three hours and 15 minutes in a cabin behind the cockpit and taking a 15-minute cat nap.

Pilots and passengers get different meals. "They're supposed to be cooked separately, in case of contamination."

Layovers in Tel Aviv, at the Sheraton Hotel, can last from 24 to 72 hours, depending on the season.

He usually visits family and friends in the city. "I have aunts and cousins and old school friends," he said.

Shabtai was born in a hospital in Jaffa and lived in Pardes Katz with his parents, Yona and Ruth, and his sister, Judith (who resides in Vancouver today).

Yehezkel Shabtai

Yona and Ruth were Iraqi Jews from Basra and Baghdad, respectively. They left Iraq at the end of 1949, via Iran, fearing that the Jewish community in Iraq no longer had a future after Israel's birth in 1948. They were also Zionists.

Shabtai's father was a train conductor in Israel, the same job he had in Iraq.

The family emigrated from Israel in 1966, believing that opportunities were greater in Canada. They settled in the Bathurst and Finch area, where Shabtai, the father of four grown children, still lives.

"I wanted to go back to Israel, but it was not to be," he said. "I felt an attachment to Israel. I had friends and relatives there."

A graduate of Newtonbrook High School, he got his pilot's licence at 17. "Flying fascinated me, and the more I got into it, the more I was hooked. After logging 10 hours in the air, I knew I wanted to be a pilot."

After getting his private pilot's licence in 1969,and his commercial licence in 1972, he worked in Sault Ste. Marie and in Kingston as an instructor and pilot before being hired by Air Canada as a second officer.

He flew routes in North America and the Caribbean before becoming a co-pilot in 1989.

"A pilot has to be able to manage a situation and make decisions based on that," he explained.

"You can't let down your guard and you have to be cool and alert," he added.

Every six months, like every other pilot, he submits to a simulator test.

Air Canada's mandatory retirement age for pilots is currently 60, but Shabtai hopes the rule will change so that he can fly for 10 more years.

As he said, "At most airlines, the retirement age is 65."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman z"l

The Jewish Community of Greater Toronto mourns the loss of Rabbi Joseph Kelman z"l – a visionary and compassionate pioneer who personified the soul of Jewish Toronto at its best. Rabbi Kelman devoted nearly 50 years to building community, improving the lives of those with special needs, and bringing Jews of all backgrounds together under one unified tent.

Through his perseverance and boldness, a generation of proud immigrant Jews found a leader and mentor. Together they helped to build a warm and vibrant Jewish Community for their children and grandchildren.

Rabbi "Joe" epitomized the best in what Jewish leadership could and should be. His legacy will live on in the thriving community and organizations he helped create and in the multi-generation of lives he touched through a half a century of dedication.

May his memory provide us with the strength and inspiration so that we may rededicate ourselves to the Jewish values and the caring and unified community Rabbi Kelman strove to build throughout his life.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

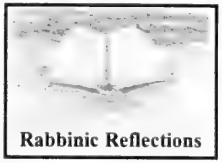
When we all come together

By RABBI SEAN GORMAN

I had the wonderful pleasure of taking my children on the family ride on behalf of the Zareinu Educational Centre on June 14.

Part of the annual Zareinu Moveathon, it was a wonderful day, full of food and fun, to help a cause that is critical to the community.



Rabbinic Reflections

I explained to one of the riders who came with me that this ride is one of the most important activities of my rabbinate.

Why? Anyone who knows me will tell you that I am always on my bicycle. And I especially love to be able to use my bicycle, not just for fun or for transportation, but for a mitzvah.

But more than that, I look around when I am at the Zareinu carnival, and it is crystal clear to me that all of our synagogues and organizations are present. When we are out at Downsview Park, there is no attention paid to denominational divide. For one thoroughly enjoyable and necessary day, our numerous disagreements have no place. The community has realized a need to support and educate children with developmental challenges and has risen as one to respond to that need.

Many other issues are out there today – the spiralling cost of kosher food, the difficulties and challenges that come with supporting our day schools, the plight of agunot and of abused women in our community. It defies logic that we cannot find a communal voice for these other concerns.

I will pump up my tires, grease the chain and make sure that I am out there for Zareinu every year. But it is my hope that we can all look at what can happen when we respond as a community, and come to understand – not that we are all different, but rather the potential that we can achieve when we put our differences aside.

Rav Sean Gorman, who has been at the Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, assumes the pulpit at the Pride of Israel Synagogue this month.

A biblical yahrzeit to remember

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Rosh Chodesh Av is fast approaching, and unlike other days of Rosh Chodesh, the new month, the month of Av does not usher in a joyous time. In fact, the sages say that as Av enters, we diminish our joy.

Nine short days after the onset of the month of Av is Tisha b'Av, the ninth of Av, the fasting day on which the Jewish people remember calamities of Jewish history that changed Jewish destiny forever.

Tisha b'Av commemorates the destructions of the ancient Temples in Jerusalem and the resulting exile that cast all Jews into the tumult of history for 2,000 years. It is certainly a day to fast and reflect – but is an ancient event completely responsible for the sages' somewhat extreme statement of joy diminished?

A foundational Jewish philosophy is to worship God with joy and to bring simchah to every opportunity. Clearly, a statement referring to diminishing our joy must be accessing information beyond history.

There is another event that occurred on Rosh Chodesh Av itself, not nine days later. In the Torah, we read of the death of Aaron, Moses' brother and Israel's first high priest. Aaron's death occurs on the first day of the month of Av, on Rosh Chodesh.

The loss of Aaron is hugely significant to the Jewish People beyond the specific loss to the generation of the Bible. Aaron is unanimously viewed by the sages as the person who mastered the art of achieving peace between people.

Pirkei Avot states that Aaron was a lover of peace, a pursuer of peace and someone who loved his fellow human beings. He greeted all those he met with a smile and eye contact, so that if they were later tempted to hurt anyone, they would think twice, questioning whether they would be able to greet Aaron and make eye contact tomorrow if they had hurt someone today. By treating everyone with dignity, Aaron raised the dignity within each person, and the resulting behaviour was one of peace.

Although it is clear throughout the Torah and rabbinic literature that peace is foundational to the world, everyone knows that it remains one of humanity's greatest challenges. To have a person in Jewish text who had mastered this great achievement is indeed something to be held dear. To have lost such a person is indeed a diminishing of our joy.

Rosh Chodesh Av is Aaron's yahrzeit, and we diminish our joy as we remember how great is the loss to the world when a person of peace is silenced. It is impossible to master Aaron's techniques or strategies since so many details of his life remain unknown. Yet, one subtle point should resound with an informing voice, and that is the introduction God gives Aaron when speaking to Moses.

When God is giving Moses instructions at the burning bush, Moses argues with God, insisting that He choose another. God reassures Moses by telling him that his brother, Aaron, is coming to greet him and will serve as his spokesperson.

One phrase stands out in this exchange. God states that Aaron will see Moses and "rejoice in his heart." The phrase seems innocent enough – the idea that one brother would rejoice at the sight of another – and yet we must not forget the narrative that immediately precedes this one. The book of Genesis consistently portrays sibling rivalries that fuel events and calamities. Beginning with Cain and ending with Joseph, the challenge of siblings fills the pages of Genesis.

God acknowledges the uniqueness of Aaron as a man of peace by stating that when seeing his brother, Aaron will rejoice in his heart. Aaron's most powerful legacy is the lesson we hear from God about him, and his yahrzeit is truly a day of diminished joy and reflection.

Lachish: gateway to Jerusalem

By ALEX GROPPER

Tel Lachish is one of the most strategic sites in Israel. On the border between the coastal plain and the hill country, it played a crucial role as the major fortress blocking the route to Jerusalem in ancient times. Its important location would lead to its violent destruction on a number of occasions.

Past Forward

As with many of the major archeological sites in Israel, Lachish's history goes back at least to the dawn of civilization at the start of the Bronze Age, circa 3000 BCE and probably earlier. The surrounding area has revealed signs of human habitation going as far back as the Neolithic period, which began almost 10,000 years ago.

The mound of Lachish was known to the Arabs as Tell ed-Duweir, and its identification with the biblical site was made by the legendary American archeologist W.F. Albright in 1929. The first excavations of Lachish were undertaken by a British team in the 1930s. Sadly, they came to a tragic end when Arab bandits murdered the leader, James Starkey, in 1938, while he was on his way to a party in Jerusalem.

Starkey's excavations, the results of which have generally withstood the test of time, revealed a site whose most important phases were in the Middle (circa 2000 to 1500 BCE) and Late Bronze (circa 1500 to 1200 BCE) ages, as well as the Israelite Monarchy period, circa 1050 to 586 BCE. Remains of a palace from the latter part of the Middle Bronze Age, as well as a number of temples from the Late Bronze Age, were discovered. The city was even mentioned in Egyptian documents dating to the late 15th and early 14th centuries BCE, including the famous Amarna tablets found at the abandoned capital of the heretic pharaoh, Akhenaten.

Among the most fascinating finds discovered by Starkey and his team were a number of inscriptions incised on broken pieces of pottery that came to be known as the Lachish Ostraca. Most of these were letters written in Hebrew dating from the last days of the Hebrew monarchy in the early sixth century BCE, just before the Babylonian destruction of the first Temple. Some of the letters were forlorn cries from the defenders for help from Jerusalem, which never came as the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar bore down on the doomed outpost. Other letters refer to a prophet whom some believe to be Jeremiah.

These letters have proven to be invaluable for scholars of biblical Hebrew in showing both the development of the script, as well as the language of the Tanach, in the days before the fall of the first Temple.

Full-scale excavations did not resume again until 1973. They were led by David Ussishkin of Tel Aviv University. Ussishkin found ample evidence of the two major sieges and destructions that Lachish underwent during the period of the Israelite monarchy. The first siege occurred circa 701 BCE, when the Assyrian king, Sennacherib, was on his way to besiege Jerusalem. The Assyrians knew that in order to march on Jerusalem they had to eliminate Lachish, which acted as a fortress blocking the route to the Judean capital.

Their siege was a model of brutal efficiency. The Assyrian army was feared throughout the Near East for its ruthlessness. The Assyrian monarch thought the conquest of Lachish important enough to depict it on the walls of his palace at Nineveh, now located in modern Iraq.

The site of Lachish was too important to lie abandoned, and it was rebuilt during the reign of the righteous King Josiah at the end of the seventh century BCE, just in time to withstand another siege and destruction, this time by the Babylonians under the leadership of the legendary Nebuchadnezzar.

As with other strategic sites in Israel, numerous battles were fought in its vicinity, the last being the siege of Latrun during the War of Independence in 1948, but this time it was we who did the besieging in the attempt to open up the road to Jerusalem. Fortunately, we succeeded.

Is Tisha b'Av relevant?

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Is Tisha b'Av relevant to Jews today? What importance does the 17th of Tammuz have or the three weeks that bridge these two fast days? Those questions are central to a debate you will see on many websites as we find ourselves in what is traditionally the most mournful period in the Jewish calendar.

The Jewish Highway

Starting with the 17th of Tammuz and culminating on the ninth of Av, these three weeks recall the destruction of the First and Second Temples, and many other persecutions of the Jewish people. [tinyurl.com/9av01] But what importance do they really have now that we have a vibrant State of Israel and the rebuilt capital of Jerusalem?

A couple of years ago, members of Israel's Reform and Progressive movements held a Tisha b'Av commemoration ceremony in Jerusalem, intended to make the day more relevant to the secular public. In order to highlight the personal loss of Jerusalem's downfall, organizer Dov Kalmanovitz used the writings of Jewish historian Josephus, who witnessed the destruction of the Second Temple and its effect on the residents of the city. "The individual victims are unknown to us," Kalmanovitz told Ha'aretz. "Texts such as this help us commemorate and remember, even though we don't know the victims' faces or names. Tisha b'Av is for them. It's not meant for grieving only over the stones, but also remembering the people." [tinyurl.com/9av10]

A blogger named Margot heard about the outreach event but wasn't sold on it. "To me, this ceremony, although clearly well intended, is missing the boat. Tisha b'Av is not relevant to secular Israelis because it does not speak to their experience of being a Jew… Israelis who are willing to live and die for their country understand suffering and loss better than most. They see, in a sense, both a refutation of Tisha b'Av in that Israel exists and an affirmation of Tisha b'Av in the ongoing war and terrorism in the region every day. When one lives in a continual cycle of mourning and rebirth, how connected can you be to Tisha b'Av?" [tinyurl.com/9av18]

Historian Yisrael Ne'eman takes a different stand. "As one who is secular and can state categorically that he pretends not to know the nature of God, or even of His existence, let it be stated here that should we forget, ignore or downplay Tisha b'Av, we not only endanger our collective Jewish being, but undermine any Zionist identity or endeavours we may call our own." Ne'eman argues that Zionists have done themselves a disservice by rejecting 3,500 years of Jewish history. "The collective Jewish spiritual being must designate Tisha b'Av as a form of a national Yom Kippur, where we scrutinize our behaviour towards ourselves and others." [tinyurl.com/9av23]

Ismar Schorsch, former chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, supports the observance of Tisha b'Av but has concerns about the three weeks. One day "of remembrance, enacted wholeheartedly is sufficient. Three weeks of escalating mournfulness, beginning with the fast day on the 17th of Tammuz, threatens to turn martyrology and victimhood into a worldview." [tinyurl.com/9av104]

Responding to Schorsch, Jonathan Rosenblum wrote in the Jerusalem Post that the three weeks play a crucial role as a time of preparation for Tisha b'Av. He asks whether a soccer team would consider skipping training to better concentrate on the World Cup itself? As for Schorsch's concerns about "victimhood," Rosenblum says the purpose of this period is not to dwell on our oppression by others but to focus on our own "collective failings for which the Temple was destroyed and has yet to be rebuilt." [tinyurl.com/9av102]

Rabbi Michael Gold caught my attention when he admitted, "I am not a very good faster. In fact, I confess that I allow most of the minor fast days of the Jewish calendar to pass without notice." But for Rabbi Gold, Tisha b'Av is important. "Tisha b'Av is a difficult fast. Some Jews fast only part of the day, maintaining that with the rebirth of Israel the sadness is mitigated. I still fast a full day. We Jews need one day of mourning. My hope is that the day becomes an opportunity to create rituals and memories, and also a time of soul searching and resolve. On Tisha b'Av, we can learn to improve ourselves and to improve the world." [tinyurl.com/9av103]

Revisiting Obama's Qur'an: one text, two truths

By JAMES A. DIAMOND

Guest Voice

As a scholar of religion, I spend much of my time both in the classroom and in research questioning and, more often than not, debunking widely held beliefs that don't stand the test of critical study. Usually these beliefs cater to what we would like reality to be rather than what it actually is, empirically and historically.

And so it was that a mythic tone was set almost immediately in U.S. President Barack Obama's recent speech at Cairo University with the sweeping generalization that "throughout history, Islam has demonstrated through words and deeds the possibilities of religious tolerance and racial equality," an assertion that does not conform to any history I am aware of, but rather rewrites it to pander to his immediate audience.

One need only mention the 12th century Almohads, who virtually destroyed Jewish and other religious communities across Morocco and Spain, to dispose of such a historical caricature. Even the more moderate Islamic regimes "throughout history" tolerated Jews and Christians, but only as dhimmi, or second-class citizens subject to numerous restrictions and legal disabilities. Islam – throughout its entire history up until the present day in those countries governed by sharia – does not abide by the principle of equality before the law, neither in gender nor in religion.

The most troubling aspect of Obama's speech, however, was his dissimulating citation of the Qur'an. Here I will deal with two of the three that informed his entire presentation. In order to lay the groundwork for a frank speech, he cited a verse that apparently promotes such straight talk: "Be conscious of God and speak always the truth."

However, the Qur'an is a religious document that purports to be divinely revealed and reflects no interest whatsoever in the empirical or cogently reasoned universal truth that western secular ears heard when this phrase was cited. The "truth" it espouses is decidedly not an objective one on which everyone can agree, but rather the truth of Islam and its doctrines. In this sense it is no different than Jewish or Christian scriptures, whose particular teachings profess to be divine truths.

As for the "truth" that the Qur'an is concerned with, this is clearly borne out in its original context in Surah 33, where it is preceded by admonishing and cursing "unbelievers," commencing with 33:64: "Surely Allah has cursed the unbelievers and has prepared for them a burning fire." It continues in 33:65: "To abide therein for a long time; they shall not find a protector or a helper," and it ends with the selected quote from 33:70: "O you who believe! be conscious of Allah and always speak the truth."

The truth the Qu'ran speaks about is the truth of what the Qur'an dictates, as opposed to the falsity of those who are "unbelievers" or profess anything other than the tenets of Islam. Surely the president, renowned for his carefully chosen and precise words, must have known what this quote would mean to the millions who live and breathe the Qur'an daily and have it committed to memory.

The truth for that audience is the truth of Islam, and what they heard was a U.S. president publicly proclaiming its truth. That quote would resonate for them with the truth of other verses, such as 49:15: "The believers are only those who believe in Allah and His Apostle then they doubt not and struggle hard with their wealth and their lives in the way of Allah; they are the truthful ones." The equation it draws is between the truth and the beliefs of the "believers." Rather than create a common ground in which different religions and peoples can intersect, this "truth" erects a barrier that cannot be overcome, short of the universal adoption of Islam.

The president's second Qur'anic reference was ostensibly to highlight Islam's reverence for all life, loosely based on Sura 5:32, which he rendered as follows: "Whoever kills an innocent, it is as if he has killed all mankind; and whoever saves a person, it is as if he has saved all mankind." It's a noble enough sentiment. However, what is most disturbing about this quote is that it is a companion piece with the very next verse, which mandates the most violent retribution imaginable against the exception to its noble sentiment that Obama strategically omitted – "those who spread mischief in the land."

For the millions of Muslims listening, that next verse could not be detached from its precursor, which calls for "execution, or crucifixion, or the cutting off of hands and feet from opposite sides, or exile from the land," against "enemies of Allah and His messenger." Once again, what those millions heard that the overwhelming majority in the West did not was a president of the United States endorsing the dismemberment of any who would undermine and attack Islam's founding father!

A capital crime in my academic occupation is to tailor history, society, religion, and texts to fit some preconceived idyllic notion of what each should be, or worse, to promote a particular agenda or policy. The entire thrust of the president's speech – to cultivate a meeting of minds between the Islamic world and the liberal democratic one – is doomed from the start by a gesture that is itself premised on words that mean entirely different things to two constituencies.

The people most familiar with the texts he quoted – witnessing the most powerful leader of the democratic world endorsing the "truths" they know that the text champions – will be emboldened to persist in the very ideologies that provoke the West's suspicions. The others will remain with an image of some eloquently crafted ideal that doesn't reflect reality, and, therefore, they'll be ill-equipped to deal with it or conduct any kind of meaningful dialogue based on it. One can never determine what the common ground is unless one is fully apprised of the ground on which the other walks.

Chef brings bistro-style kosher fare to Toronto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"It's very rare to find food in my fridge," he said.

You might think that Marron is oblivious to the joys and pleasures of food, but appearances can be deceiving.

As he put it, "I really like food, and love to eat."

Which is an understatement.

He's the owner of and chief chef at Marron Bistro Moderne (948 Eglinton Ave. W.), a strictly kosher restaurant that he has operated since 2006 and is frequented primarily by Orthodox diners.

Eran Marron

Although he was raised in a secular Jewish household, Marron, a 28-year-old Israeli, has become observant since settling in Toronto several years ago.

And now that he has found his religious bearings, he is tightly focused. "I'm on a mission to bring kosher food to the wider community," explained Marron, who specializes in simple French bistro fare.

Appetizers included a beet and endive salad garnished with caramelized walnuts and poached pears and drizzled with balsamic dressing.

Main courses ran the gamut from duck, accompanied by cabbage in red wine, sweet potato purée and orange sauce, to the house burger, a ground beef patty served with tomatoes, onions and french fries.

Marron changes his menu quite often, but his specialties remain constant, including cured chicken slathered with Portobello mushrooms and smoked salmon and trout pâté with a charcuterie salad.

Marron's culinary wizardry is not cheap. A three-course meal for two, with wine, is about $120.

"Our meat costs are very high," explained Marron, who uses only home-made products that he and his two assistants confect in his kitchen. "I pay top dollar for the best products."

Since he is a great believer in local produce, 90 per cent of his ingredients are Canadian. But in a nod to his Middle Eastern origins, he buys a date spread made in Israel.

Business has been good so far. On average, he and his staff serve 40 to 60 meals a day.

Marron's bistro, with a bright Parisian-style exterior and a muted interior graced by mirrors, stands out in a busy neighbourhood brimming with forgettably bland façades.

He employs two cooks, two waiters, a manager and a dishwasher. "I couldn't do it without them."

The restaurant is open Sunday to Thursday from 6 p.m. to 11 p.m. Ordinarily, Marron arrives at around 8 a.m. and doesn't leave until at least midnight.

A bachelor, he arrived in Canada by way of New York City, where he worked for celebrity chef Daniel Boulud at his restaurant's soup, canape and appetizer stations.

On a trip to Vancouver, he met fellow Israeli Igal Abergel, who convinced him to move to Toronto to work at his restaurant, Shemen Zait. Marron remained there for about a year.

Prior to New York, Marron studied culinary arts at the Harvard of cooking schools, the Paul Bocuse Institute, near Lyon, France. "It made me what I am today," he said.

Marron was born and raised in Haifa, the son of Romanian immigrants. His father, Micah, is a contractor who once owned a pizzeria. His mother, Varda, is a cosmetician.

Since she was invariably too busy to cook for the family, Marron and his brother had to fend for themselves.

"I was a big fan of chicken wings and red peppers stuffed with cottage cheese," he said, savouring the memory of these disparate dishes.

In part, Marron's career path was paved by his grandparents. Grandpa made sausages to die for, while grandma whipped up amazing verenikas, borscht and Romanian-flavoured kebabs.

During his army service from 1997 to 2000, Marron was designated to be a cook.

"Making schnitzels for 900 soldiers taught me the value of discipline, structure and hard work," he said.

As a French-trained chef, Marron is accustomed to cooking with butter and cream, but since these ingredients are taboo in meat-based kosher cuisine, he has had to adapt and learn to be more creative than the chef who does not have to worry about such considerations.

Although he has amassed considerable experience in the kitchen, Marron realizes that he still has a lot to learn.

He has taken a cake design course and recently finished an apprenticeship with a butcher. He now plans to apprentice himself out to a bread baker.

In addition, he reads cookbooks as if they were novels.

Although his passion is French food, Marron still admires the popular fare of Israel – hummus, shawarma, falafel, burekas and the like.

As well, he enjoys chicken, veal and turkey schnitzel, not to mention pizza.

Far from his home in Israel, he has blended astonishingly well into the Toronto restaurant scene, and there is no better indication of that than the success of the Marron Bistro Moderne.

"The best clientele I've ever had is in Toronto," he said. "The people are kind and they appreciate good food."

HU scientist seeks to starve cancerous tumours

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Driven by the ambition to discover an alternative to risky bypass surgery and a way to starve cancerous tumours, Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor Eli Keshet has spent the last two decades studying the vascular system and the mechanisms of blood vessel formation.

In June, during a six-day trip to Israel sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University – a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for Hebrew U, with chapters from coast to coast – six Canadian journalists spent an afternoon with some of Israel's brightest scientific minds.

One of the meetings was with Keshet, who spoke of his discovery that revealed a protein called VEGF, which initiates the formation of new blood vessels when older ones need to be bypassed because of an occlusion, or a blockage.

With this knowledge, Keshet is also working to understand how to inhibit the formation of blood vessels so as to starve cancerous tumours that rely on blood vessels for nourishment.

Keshet's work has contributed to clinical trials of cancer-fighting drugs that neutralize a tumour's ability to attract blood vessels from which it thrives.

"Our work concerns trying to gain more insight into how new blood vessels are made in the body. The notion is that once sufficient insights are made, maybe we can harness this knowledge in order to manipulate the vascular system at will," Keshet said.

He said every organ and tissue in the body is no further away than one-tenth of a millimetre from a blood capillary so that it can secure an efficient exchange of blood cells.

When an artery becomes clogged, all the tissues that are serviced by these vessels are now suffering from an insufficient supply of oxygenated blood cells.

"In our vascular system, in a remarkable way, it can always sense that if there are not enough blood vessels in the area… it has a remarkable ability of self-rectifying itself to make more blood vessels in the area where you need to enforce the vascular supply," Keshet said.

"The question is, how does the tissue know that it needs to make new blood vessels? The tissue knows because it's experiencing hypoxia. The lack of oxygen is the signal for the trigger. Somehow, this factor, VEGF, is responsive to the lack of oxygen."

He said that when tissue experiences hypoxia, it secretes VEGF and reacts on specific receptors that are found on the surface of blood vessels.

Although the body has a way of producing blood vessels to bypass blockages naturally, Keshet said, it often becomes a race against time.

Hebrew University of Jerusalem professor Eli Keshet has spent the last two decades studying the vascular system and the mechanisms of blood vessel formation.

"What would happen first? Would you lose a limb or suffer some major consequences, or would you [produce the vessels] in time [to avoid any damage]?"

When a blockage is detected, Keshet said, the common practice is for surgeons to use an existing artery or vein from another part of the body and connect it to the heart so that the blood can bypass the occlusion.

But the hope, he said, is that his research will lead to a way to trigger the body to create new blood vessels more efficiently where and when they are needed so as to avoid surgery.

"If we can implant, pharmacologically, some protein or a factor that induces the formation of new blood vessels – we are thinking about making our own bypasses instead of resorting to surgical bypasses," Keshet said.

"This would be great, wouldn't it? But the question, of course, is how you do it… How can we make it fast enough or efficient enough before [a patient] suffers an amputation or heart disease?"

Keshet said the protein responsible for triggering the formation of new blood vessels, VEGF, can be made artificially.

"We isolated the gene that makes the factor and we can implant it and we can produce tons of it. Producing the factor is not a problem. But the question is, how are we going to apply it?"

He said the factor is currently the subject of clinical trials to see the most effective way of administering it, whether by injection or by slow-release implants that release VEGF in a controlled way.

"Now people are trying to address the question of how to use it, to make sure it won't be too much, how to secure it, make sure it works locally."

Keshet said learning how to control the production of blood vessels could also help treat cancer. If medical specialists learn how to inhibit blood vessels from developing around cancerous tumours, the tumours could be starved of a blood supply and be kept from developing.

"The whole idea is, can we inhibit the angiogenic process so we can starve the tumour to death?… What you do is you inject something that would neutralize the VEGF activity… This is really straightforward thinking, and the nice thing is that it is working and it's already in the clinic," Keshet said.

He said the clinical trials are meant to discover how to improve the efficacy of this procedure, to reduce any side effects and try to anticipate whether a tumour could develop a resistance to the treatment.

"We want to see the mechanism of how tumours can escape this treatment by finding alternative ways of producing blood vessels because tumours always outsmart us… We want to outsmart the outsmarters."

Maccabiah reputation so positive in Canada

Only 240 Canadians were on that Maccabiah team, while the current edition of Team Canada topped out at about 410 athletes and another 80 or more coaching, medical, training and administrative staff. That's about 100 more than at the last Games four years ago.

The Maccabiah reputation is so positive in Canada that more that 2,000 athletes registered for a chance to make the team, Gerskup said.

Only the host Israelis, with more than 2,000 athletes, and the Americans, with 900, will have larger delegations than Canada, he continued. Altogether, 7,500 athletes from more than 60 countries, plus Israel, are expected for the celebration of sport and Jewish identity.

"I think word is out that this is a great trip," Gerskup said from his north Toronto office. "I want the athletes to have the most amazing experience, something they will remember for a long time."

Many from his 1985 silver medal-winning softball team will be coming back this summer for the masters softball tournament, hoping to relive their glory days.

One area that Gerskup has been keen to cultivate is the increased participation of women athletes. That meshed nicely with a policy decision in Israel, which "also wants female athletes," he said.

Team Canada features a number of women's teams: soccer, softball, volleyball (a first), cycling, fencing, tennis, triathlon and junior soccer. There will also be women's participation in karate, gymnastics, squash, swimming and golf.

While Israel has been pushing for more women's participation, finding quality athletes in some regions has proven problematic. Cultural attitudes in South America and Europe limit the scope of the women's teams. The greatest response has been from Canada, the United States, Britain, Australia, South Africa and Israel.

The Canadian contingent is heavy on team sports. In addition to the female squads mentioned above, Maccabi Canada is sending men's open softball and a junior baseball team, as well as masters' softball, open volleyball, open water polo and basketball teams. Altogether, there will be six Canadian soccer teams and six basketball teams divided between the various open, women's, junior (boys and girls) and masters categories.

In addition, Maccabi Canada is fielding a track team and sending athletes in swimming, fencing, karate, judo, rugby, golf and 10-pin bowling, among others.

While the Maccabiah Games are often referred to as the Jewish Olympics, only a smattering of actual Olympians have competed in them. Some of the more notable past participants include swimmer Mark Spitz, gymnast Mitch Gaylord, golfer Corey Pavin, basketball players Ernie Grunfeld and Danny Schayes, tennis player Dick Savitt and swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg.

The most notable world-class athlete at the 18th Chai Games will likely be American Olympian Jason Lezak, who has chosen to be in Israel rather than at the World Swimming Championships in Rome.

The three-time Olympic gold medalist told Associated Press his Jewish heritage inspired him to compete in the Games.

While in Israel, Canadian athletes will get a broader cultural exposure to their Jewish heritage. All junior athletes will be taken to the Western Wall, Yad Vashem and other must-see locations such as the Dead Sea, and other cultural events have been arranged.

Gerskup has also recruited Rabbi Yossi Sapirman of Toronto's Beth Torah Congregation to serve as spiritual counsellor for the Canadian delegation. "I wanted to put some Jewishness into this, and he's a pretty cool guy. He relates to young people and old people. He's a good speaker and he's been to Israel many times.," Gerskup said.

The Canadian athletes gathered in Toronto last week for pre-Games training and a farewell party. The group departed for Israel on July 9. The Games run from July 12 to 23 at venues in Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Caesarea and Netanya.

QJC questions union's endorsement of Israel boycott

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) has expressed its disappointment that one of the province's largest labour groups is supporting an economic boycott of Israel.

The Centrale des syndicats du Québec (CSQ) has adopted a resolution calling for divestment from and sanctions against Israel to protest the state's allegedly illegal occupation of Palestinian territory and violation of the Palestinian people's rights.

The resolution came up at the annual convention of the CSQ held in Quebec City at the end of June. It was proposed by Monique Pauzé, president of the Syndicat de l'enseignement de Champlain, a teachers' union local encompassing schools south and southwest of Montreal.

According to information provided by the CSQ, the union represents nearly 170,000 members, of whom about 100,000 are employed in the education sector, from daycares to cégeps. Members also work in the health and social services fields and in recreation and culture, among other areas.

QJC president Adam Atlas said Congress has written to CSQ president Réjean Parent voicing its disappointment.

"It appears that indignation for Israel exceeds empathy for other more troubled people around the world, for instance, human rights activists in Iran, or the threat to world peace posed by North Korea, the Mugabe regime in Zimbabwe and the Muslim community in China," Atlas said in an interview.

Adam Atlas

"It's regrettable that the labour movement has singled out one trouble spot in the world."

Atlas hopes that this anti-Israel policy does not make its way into Quebec's classrooms. The resolution states that the CSQ is committed to promoting the boycott campaign among its membership.

Atlas noted that the CSQ was among the groups that endorsed the Jan. 9 downtown demonstration against Israel's military action in Gaza, which was publicized with a press release denouncing Israel's "murderous aggression."

"At that demonstration, 'death to Jews' [was uttered], but neither M. Parent nor the CSQ distanced themselves from those remarks. So with that, and now this resolution, it is very disappointing," Atlas said.

"We would much prefer that the CSQ engage in productive dialogue and relations with its brothers and sisters in Israel's labour federation, Histadrut, which is actively trying to bring peace between Israelis and Palestinians.

"Boycotting Israel is damaging to Israeli and Palestinian workers who are trying to make peace… Taking sides is blatantly harmful to the peace process."

Also worrisome to QJC is that the CSQ's endorsement of the internationally promoted boycott "gives comfort to those who are anti-Semitic.

"I'm not saying the CSQ is anti-Semitic, but those who are will take comfort."

He noted that an organization like Montreal-based Tadamon (Arabic for solidarity), which is openly working to have Hezbollah removed from Canada's terrorist list, has applauded the resolution.

Tadamon and Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights issued a statement congratulating the CSQ for "this courageous and historic stance in solidarity with the Palestinian people suffering under the Israeli policies of apartheid, occupation and siege."

Kosher stampede breakfast attracts nearly 1,000 people

By RACHEL BARSKY
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — This year marked the 97th annual Calgary Stampede, and the city's Jewish community knew how to celebrate it.

The stampede, which ran from July 3 to 12, is the world's largest outdoor rodeo, and usually attracts 1.2 million visitors each year. Although, at about 8,000 members, Calgary's Jewish population seems miniscule next to that number, its stampede spirit is strong.

The Calgary Jewish Community Centre teamed up with Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel to host the world's only kosher stampede breakfast on July 5.

Close to 1,000 people attended the breakfast, mostly from the Jewish community but quite a few non-Jewish friends came as well.

The modern Orthodox synagogue began hosting the breakfast in 1998, said volunteer and House of Jacob member Sheila Martin.

"The whole community is invited. It's nice to have a kosher breakfast – otherwise observant people wouldn't have anywhere else to go," she said.

This year's breakfast is especially notable, as not only is it the stampede's 97th anniversary, but it's also the 100th anniversary of the House of Jacob and the 120th anniversary of Jewish life in Calgary.

At the breakfast, people danced to the music of the Calgary Fiddlers and kids enjoyed pony rides.

The Calgary Jewish Community Centre (CJCC) and House of Jacob's centennial float made its debut in the stampede parade on July 3.

It might be surprising to some, but Jews have had a presence at the stampede throughout its history.

"Jews have been part of the tradition the stampede started from," said Agnes Romer-Segal of the Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta.

There were many Jewish cattle sellers and ranchers, fur and hide dealers, and Jews working in the Calgary stockyards. Some Jews were homesteaders in Alberta, while others were farmers. There were even a few Jewish cowboys, such as Curly Gurevitch, who in one 1930 photograph wears flared leather chaps and a shirt with a Magen David and the letters "AZA" (Aleph Zadik Aleph, the B'nai Brith Youth Organization's boys' section) on it.

The most prominent Jewish connection to the Calgary Stampede is probably the Smithbilt Hat Company, the makers of Calgary's famous "White Hats." Smithbilt was started by Russian-Jewish immigrant Morris Shumiatcher in 1919 and was later owned by Isaac Aptowitzer. Inside the Smithbilt hats are the initials "CK," for "Calgary Kosher."

Even those without much knowledge of Calgary's Jewish history had a great time at the stampede.

"It's very funny watching a bunch of Jewish people pretending to be cowboys," said Josh Lamm with a laugh.

Lamm and his wife, Rivki, were visiting Alberta and Montana from Long Island, N.Y. When they told their friends they were travelling to the Rockies, the Lamms were advised to stop in Calgary for the stampede. House of Jacob members Debbie and Nelson Halpern hosted the couple during Shabbat. "We are so impressed by the hospitality of the shul and the people," Rivki said.

To many people at the breakfast, Calgary's Jewish community exemplifies the stampede's message of western hospitality. "Calgary's community is a wonderful, welcoming community," said Nava Wainer, a native Israeli who moved to Calgary 12 years ago from Toronto.

"A lot of people have moved here from other places. When you don't have family, your friends become your family – we have that here," she said.

The Stampede was a bit of a culture shock, Wainer added. "When we first moved to Calgary, my son, who was younger then, said: 'What is this, another Purim?'"

Helen Walker said that she came to the breakfast because she knew she "wouldn't have to say no to people bothering me to eat sausages, bacon and pork products."

Shelley Cohen's favourite stampede event took place on July 12, when her 23-year-old son, David, the pianist for Nashville-based singer Johnny Reid's band, performed.

Shula Banchik, the CJCC's youth and adult program coordinator, helped House of Jacob congregant Larry Katz organize the breakfast.

"It's so gratifying to see so many people in both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities come to help celebrate the 120th anniversary of Jewish life in Calgary and the 100th anniversary of the House of Jacob," said Katz.

"I hope we can continue to have great events – this is the beginning of many more celebrations."

OSCE resolution addressing growing anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) has passed a resolution condemning increasing manifestations of anti-Semitism in which Jews are being blamed for the international economic crisis.

Legislators meeting in the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly in Vilnius, Lithuania, passed the resolution with only one dissenting vote, said Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein, vice-president of the Parliamentary Assembly.

"The OSCE Parliamentary Assembly remains greatly concerned at the increase in xenophobia and other forms of intolerance directed towards vulnerable groups during the economic crisis, including an increase in anti-Semitism characterized by claims that Jews were responsible for the economic crisis," the resolution states.

The resolution endorses a declaration from the recent London Conference on Combatting Anti-Semitism and calls on governments "to develop strategies to address television broadcasts and other uses of media and Internet that promote anti-Semitism, while ensuring that such strategies and any related legislation fully respect the freedoms of expression, assembly and association and are not used to repress peaceful activities of civil society, or political or religious groups or of individuals."

Among the measures recommended by the parliamentary group are:

- combating anti-Semitism through the promotion of democratic and "human values" as well as law enforcement;
- developing public reporting mechanisms;
- devising education and training programs "throughout the judicial and school systems;"
- encouraging Holocaust education;
- co-ordinating "the response of participating states to combat the use of the Internet to promote incitement to hatred."

The Vilnius meeting followed earlier OSCE gatherings, dating back to 2003, in Vienna, Berlin, Brussels and Cordoba to address anti-Semitism.

'We're not going to just wait indefinitely'

"If Iran chooses not to walk through that door, then you have on record the G8 to begin with and, I think, potentially a lot of other countries," he said.

"We're not going to just wait indefinitely and allow for the development of a nuclear weapon... and wake up one day and find ourselves in a much worse situation and unable to act."

Obama said his hope is that the Iranian leadership "will recognize that world opinion is clear."

U.S. President Barack Obama

At the summit, French President Nicolas Sarkozy warned that a unilateral attack by Israel against Iran to thwart the Islamic republic's nuclear ambitions would be an "absolute catastrophe."

The French president said that major powers in the G8 would give negotiations with Iran a chance until September.

After Sarkozy's statement last Wednesday, a senior adviser to Iran's top authority said in remarks published the next day that the Islamic Republic would not back down "even one step" over its nuclear work, making clear Tehran's continued defiance toward the West.

Ali Akbar Velayati, Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's top adviser on international affairs, said western countries don't want the Islamic state to have peaceful nuclear activities, state broadcaster IRIB said on its website.

Speaking after talks with fellow G8 leaders, Sarkozy said they would review the situation at the G20 meeting of developed and developing countries in Pittsburgh on Sept. 24 and 25.

"If there is no progress by then, we will have to take decisions," said Sarkozy, indicating that tougher sanctions might be imposed if Tehran continued to resist negotiations.

Western countries believe Iran is trying to build an atomic bomb. Tehran insists it wants to master nuclear technology to generate electricity and has rejected all overtures for talks.

U.S. and Canadian officials, meanwhile, said the world's main industrialized nations were growing increasingly impatient.

"All G8 nations are united. There is a strong consensus at the table that unless things change soon, there will be further action," said Canadian spokesperson Dimitri Soudas.

A White House deputy national security adviser, Mike Froman, told reporters that the G8 discussions had reflected "a collective impatience with Iran."

French President Nicolas Sarkozy

However, Sarkozy made it clear that Russia was still dragging its feet over the issue and had pushed for more time before considering a fresh round of sanctions.

"We made an effort to agree not to strengthen sanctions straightaway in order to bring everyone on board. The more reserved among us agreed that Pittsburgh was the time for decisions," Sarkozy said.

In a separate statement, the G8 said it was committed to finding a diplomatic solution to Iran's nuclear program.

"We sincerely hope that Iran will seize this opportunity to give diplomacy a chance," the statement said.

The G8 statement came after Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's top national security adviser said last Wednesday that the United States was distancing itself from Israel's position on Iran.

The statement also deplored the violence in Iran following last month's disputed presidential election and said arrests of journalists and foreigners there were "unacceptable."

As well, the statement repeated criticism of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for denying the Holocaust.

Mubarak says Schalit 'fine'

Kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit is "fine," Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said. "I believe there were contacts [with Schalit] and that soldier Schalit is fine, and I hope that in the upcoming period, maybe, not in the long term, the issue of soldier Schalit will end," Mubarak told journalists after a meeting last week with Israeli President Shimon Peres.

Damages for reinterment

Israel must compensate two families whose sons' graves were relocated after the withdrawal from Gaza. The Jerusalem District Court ordered the state to pay about $1.28 million (US) to Moshe and Linda Stein and Rachel and Eli Loutati, whose sons' graves were relocated from Gush Katif to Nitzan following the 2005 disengagement. The families weren't permitted to attend the disinterment. Photos distributed at the time showed soldiers exhuming the bodies laughing as they worked. The renewed grief in one of the families reached pathological levels, according to a psychiatric assessment.

Gas site larger than thought

A natural gas reserve off the coast of Haifa is larger than first thought. The Tamar 2 drilling site is nearly 30 per cent larger than previously estimated and could reach 180 billion cubic metres, according to prospect partner Nobel Energy Inc., the Israeli business newspaper Globes reported. The value of the field could reach $30 billion (US). The new estimate means the reserve could fill Israel's natural gas needs for about 20 years, according to Globes.

Rights head: remove fence

A United Nations official called on Israel to tear down the West Bank security fence.

UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Navi Pillay made the declaration July 8 in Jerusalem on the fifth anniversary of the International Court of Justice decision that the barrier, comprising fencing with barbed wire, concrete blocks and electronic sensors, is illegal and a violation of Palestinian rights. The court's opinion is not enforceable. Pillay urged Israel to take down the barrier and make reparations.

A world wonder?

The Dead Sea has made the list of candidates for the new Seven Natural Wonders of the World after Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas agreed to support the initiative. The lake will be one of the 77 sites nominated for the prestigious honour, along with such contenders as the Grand Canyon, Germany's Black Forest, and the Great Barrier Reef.

No change on settlements

The United States denied a report that it would allow the completion of 2,500 housing units in the West Bank as part of a compromise on settlements. "No, that report, and that Israeli media outlet, is inaccurate," State Department spokesperson Ian Kelly said, referring to a story in Ma'ariv. "Our position has not changed." U.S. President Barack Obama has come out for a complete freeze on settlement building. Kelly added: "This activity has to stop. This is laid out in the 'road map' [peace plan]. So the reports aren't accurate." Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev said the two countries are trying to find common ground on the settlement issue, but he wouldn't comment directly on the Ma'ariv story, according to media reports. Israel says the building of the 2,500 units is already under way and can't be lawfully stopped.

Is Lieberman being shunted aside?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

If Avigdor Lieberman's appointment as foreign minister seemed odd when it was made, recent developments cast more doubt over his capacity to function as Israel's top diplomat.

Israel's most acute foreign policy challenge – the showdown with the United States over building in West Bank settlements – is being handled largely by Defence Minister Ehud Barak following discreet signals from Obama administration officials that they prefer dealing with Barak rather than Lieberman.

This week, Israeli President Shimon Peres was chosen to represent Israel on a sensitive diplomatic mission to Cairo. Lieberman, who said last November that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak could "go to hell" if he didn't want to visit Israel, is persona non grata in Cairo.

And behind the scenes, it's Silvan Shalom, the minister for regional co-operation, who is working to develop ties with the Arab world, not Lieberman.

Perhaps the most dramatic rejection of Lieberman as foreign minister has come from Europe. In a private conversation in late June, French President Nicolas Sarkozy reportedly urged Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to dump Lieberman for the sake of Middle East peacemaking.

"You must get rid of that man," Sarkozy was quoted as saying. "Get him out and bring [Kadima leader Tzipi] Livni in. With her and with Barak, you can make history."

Kept at arm's length by the Americans, ostracized by the Arabs and spurned by some leading Europeans, Lieberman, who is reviled for what many see as his anti-Arab, racist views, soon may find himself foreign minister in name only.

As media criticism in Israel of Lieberman's inability to advance Israel's foreign policy interests mounted, Lieberman called a news conference in the Knesset last week to downplay the allegations. He argued that it was only natural that Barak was handling the settlement issue, since as defence minister he was formally responsible for the occupied West Bank and everything that goes on there.

Although that is the case – the West Bank is under the Israel Defence Forces' Central Command and the civilian coordinator of government activities in the territories, both of which fall under the defence minister's purview – it's unlikely that any other foreign minister would have been sidelined to the extent that Lieberman has been.

Reflecting just how much he's feeling the heat, Lieberman offered another, more dubious explanation for Barak's role: he claimed that as a settler – Lieberman lives in the West Bank settlement of Nokdim – it would be a conflict of interest if he were to deal with the settlement issue.

"I would not want to be blamed for deliberately undermining negotiations with the Americans," Lieberman said.

He also made light of Sarkozy's call for his ouster.

"People sometimes say unnecessary things," Lieberman said. "I see it as an unfortunate slip of the tongue."

Israeli commentators don't seem convinced, expressing increasing skepticism over Lieberman's ability to make a significant contribution to Israeli foreign policy.

There are even signs of an incipient campaign for Lieberman's ouster. The left-leaning Ha'aretz daily has taken the lead with a string of anti-Lieberman cartoons and commentaries, including an online editorial headlined "Sarkozy is right – Lieberman must go."

"On the eve of the renewal of negotiations with the Palestinians and perhaps with Syria, too, Israel needs all the support it can muster from the international community," the editorialists wrote. "It is imperative to replace Lieberman with another foreign minister, who will benefit from an open door in the world's capitals."

During the campaign, Lieberman stirred controversy by calling for mandatory loyalty oaths to the Jewish state in a bid to curtail Israeli Arabs' political rights. After the campaign, he declared the Annapolis peace process null and void.

Lieberman's party, Yisrael Beiteinu, is the third largest in the Knesset. During coalition negotiations in the spring, Netanyahu was afraid that Lieberman might form a government with Livni's Kadima, thereby denying Netanyahu the premiership. His fears were compounded when Lieberman, in the middle of coalition negotiations, suddenly took off for Moldova, leaving everyone, including Netanyahu, guessing.

The tactics helped prompt Netanyahu to offer Lieberman the coveted post of foreign minister to lure him into the coalition.

While Lieberman has been sidelined overseas, both Netanyahu and Barak have been trying to keep Lieberman happy and in the loop. For example, immediately after his most recent meeting with special U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell on the settlements, Barak phoned Lieberman from London to update him.

The last thing Netanyahu and Barak want is for Lieberman to bolt the coalition. As long as Livni remains uninterested in joining the government, Lieberman's departure could topple the government. In that context, covering for Lieberman as foreign minister is a small price to pay for keeping the government intact.

CELEBRATING INDEPENDENCE AND FRIENDSHIP

The Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI) recently held its annual Independence Day/Canada Day celebration at the Cinematheque in Jerusalem.

Celebrants enjoyed a festive meal and mingles with friends and family, as well a premiere screening of the Israeli film Public Enemies.

"While this day is special, so is this year 2009. It marks 60 years of diplomatic relations between Canada-Israel," she said. "One of the strongest links between our two countries is you – the Canadians who have made Israel their home. You are the human touch that helps to create such a meaningful connection between Israel and Canada.

"For Canadians, Canada Day is an opportunity to get together to express our national pride. This year, we all have a very good reason to be proud. Recently, Canada was the first country to refuse to participate in the [UN] Durban Review Conference [against racism] in Geneva after Israel was singled out for criticism. Canada consistently supports Israel's right to live in peace.

Jewish museum to open in Warsaw in 2012

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

WARSAW, Poland — The world's first and only museum to focus on Polish Jews is scheduled to open in 2012 in the heart of the former Nazi ghetto.

Expected to become a cultural landmark in Warsaw, the capital of Poland, the multimedia Museum of the History of Polish Jews will face sculptor Natan Rappaport's imposing bronze and granite memorial, which pays homage to the heroic but futile 1943 ghetto uprising.

Ewa Wierzynska

At a groundbreaking ceremony on June 30, attended by museum officials and politicians, including the mayor of Warsaw, Hanna Gronkiewicz-Waltz, Poland's cultural minister, Bogdan Zdrojewski, described it as "a magnificent project."

The museum's director, Jerzy Halberstadt, went one step further.

"Prior to the Holocaust, Warsaw was one of the world's main centres of Jewish life, where politics, culture, publishing and Jewish theatre thrived," he noted. "Warsaw was the leading centre, surpassing other cities in the United States and Europe. So we have come full circle, and beginning the construction of the museum is also an element of closing this circle."

Scheduled to cost more than $70 million, it is sponsored and supported by the city of Warsaw, the Polish ministry of culture, Warsaw's Jewish Historical Institute and an international roster of donors.

Designed by Finnish architect Rainer Mahlamaki and to be built by Poland's largest construction and engineering company, Polimex-Mostostal, the 46,618-square-foot glass-walled structure is intended to foster respect for and understanding of Jewish tradition and culture, said the museum's deputy director, Ewa Wierzynska, in a recent interview.

Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka

"It's important to understand what was here, in Poland, before the Holocaust," she added in a reference to Poland's prewar Jewish population of 3.3 million Jews. "The Holocaust erased an entire civilization, and it's important to bring back the magnificence of Jewish life."

Wierzynska, who was raised amid the ruins of the ghetto in postwar Warsaw, hopes the museum will usher in a new chapter in Polish-Jewish relations. "This museum, it's hoped, will make the conversation between Jews and Poles easier and bring some reconciliation."

Poland's former prime minister, Leszek Miller, has said that it is part of a national agenda of reconciliation that includes the commemoration of the Holocaust, the restitution of Jewish property and the restoration of some 1,000 Jewish cemeteries throughout Poland.

As he put it, "We want to reach beyond the image of Poland as a place of martyrdom for the Jews."

Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka, the museum's former director of development, the current secretary of state in the chancellery of the Polish president and Poland's next consul general in New York City, voiced confidence that it will improve Poland's fraught relationship with Jews.

"This museum will be a meeting place to impart knowledge and break down stereotypes, which are painful on both sides," she said in an interview.

The museum's brochure address this point: "It will be a portal, a place to begin an exploration of the world of Polish Jews. It will be a forum, a place of dialogue and civic engagement. It will be a catalyst that inspires visitors to reflect on the personal and historical significance of the civilization of Polish Jews."

In addition, the museum is intended to confront hatred and promote moral responsibility and democratic values in post-Communist Poland.

Through the medium of exhibits, public programs, commemorations, conferences and student exchanges, the museum aspires to be an educational and resource centre.

Wierzynska explained that the museum will underscore the fact that Jews were a fundamental component of Polish society for almost 1,000 years.

"The Jewish past is integrally intertwined with Polish history," she observed.

Poland's current president, Lech Kaczynski, has said, "There is no doubt that the history of Polish Jews is part of my country's history. And it calls for remembrance and commemoration."

Museum officials estimate it will attract 450,000 visitors a year, the majority from Poland and the rest from Israel, the United States and Canada and the European continent.

In the meantime, the museum has launched a website, Virtual Shtetl (at www.sztetl.org.pl), which has collected information on 800 of the more than 2,000 towns, cities and villages where Polish Jews lived.

"This portal may become the greatest source of information about Jewish life in Poland before World War II," he said. "For many people, this will be an encounter with something they thought was forever lost."

Got a house? Get a pre-nup or co-hab!

Family Matters

Question. I'm currently involved with a man who has no assets or any prospect of ever having any. I, on the other hand, have money to buy a house outright and am planning on doing so one day. I am wondering how much a prenuptial agreement will protect me from having him take half in the event that a marriage with him one day ends in divorce.

Is the only way to protect my assets to put them in someone else's name like a family member? My cousin told me that the best thing to do would be to put the home in the name of a family business. Does it make a difference?

Answer. Ignore your cousin. Putting the house in a family business' or someone else's name can create big tax problems, since when you sell you may pay substantial capital gains tax on the increase in value. To be tax-free the profit you earn on the sale of your home has to be from your "principal residence", i.e. the home in which you actually reside, not the family business or the "someone else."

Alternatively, some have a trusted third party, such as a parent or a friendly third-party corporation not owned by them, place a non-interest bearing mortgage for the entire equity of the home. The only problem with this method is that it does not protect you if the house goes up in value.

Say, for instance, you purchase the home for $400,000 and your parents place a mortgage for an equivalent amount and you get married. Ten years later the value is now $600,000. Assuming there are no other assets or liabilities and you have married, your husband still shares in one half of the increase in value, i.e. he is entitled to $100,000 of the $200,000 increase.

The best solution is a cohabitation agreement which automatically becomes a marriage contract if you two should ever marry. In this contract he should waive any rights to the home, including any increase in its value.

In addition you both must have full and complete financial disclosure of your income, assets and liabilities as of the date the agreement was signed so that he can't ask a Judge to "set aside" the contract by claiming you failed to inform him of what you had when he signed his rights away.

Jewish Woodstock promotes pluralism in homogeneous Poland

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

KRAKOW, Poland — On a balmy night late last month, hundreds of people crowded into the Tempel Synagogue on Miodowa Street in Krakow's old Jewish Kazimierz quarter.

They waited patiently until burly ushers allowed them into the ornate, gold-leaf decorated mid-19th-century Moorish Revival Reform shul, which was desecrated by the Nazis during the Holocaust but renovated in the 1990s.

They had come to hear a concert by the Emil Zrihan Ensemble from Israel at the 19th Jewish Cultural Festival, the biggest such event in Europe and probably the world.

Apart from Zrihan, a Moroccan-born cantor living in Ashkelon, the group consisted of Yoram Azulay on the tar, Shimon Eliahu Vanunu on the oud, Haim Ohaion on the darbuka and Elhad Levi on the violin.

The band played sinewy and lilting Judeo-Andalusian music, while Zrihan, clad in a white jacket, black pants and a matching shirt, belted out one intense and captivating song after another, his face growing red as he displayed a vocal prowess of formidable proportions.

The crowd loved Zrihan, popularly known as the Moroccan nightingale, calling him out for no less than three encores as he brought down the house in a cascade of rhythmic clapping and cheering.

What was significant about the concert, aside from its sheer virtuosity, was the fact that the audience was primarily composed of Catholic Poles, reflecting Poland's relatively new-found interest in Jewish culture and history, particularly since the end of the communist era in 1989.

The Jewish Cultural Festival in Krakow, which is far bigger than a similar festival in Warsaw, takes place annually, starting in late June or early July, and lasts for nine days. This year's version ran from June 27 to July 5.

Call it Poland's Jewish Woodstock.

Designed to educate Poles about a huge and venerable Jewish community that was decimated by the Nazis in a six-year orgy of unprecedented violence and brutality, the festival featured concerts, plays, movie screenings, workshops, lectures, exhibitions and tours.

There were concerts by American cantors and Polish bands, and workshops on Yiddish, Hebrew, Jewish dance and Jewish cooking. There were lectures on Jewish life in present-day Poland, Poland's relationship with Israel and the mystical sources of Chassidism. There was a screening of an Israeli documentary film on the 1982 war in Lebanon, and there were exhibitions on Polish synagogues and Judaica, as well as tours of the remnants of shtetls near Krakow and of synagogues in Kazimierz.

Much of the festival unfolded in Kazimierz, a hub of Jewish Orthodoxy before the Holocaust. After World War II, Kazimierz fell into a decrepit state.

Revived after Steven Spielberg filmed Schindler's List in its atmospheric byways, Kazimierz today brims with Jewish-style restaurants and cafés and shops selling Judaica and books of Jewish interest.

The festival, observed Lech Kaczynski, Poland's president, in a brief essay in its official handbook, summons up memories of "the shared history of Jews and Poles."

Its founder and director, Janusz Makuch, works out of an office on Jozefa Street, in the heart of Kazimierz. It is near the High Synagogue, one of several shuls in this colourful and gentrified neighbourhood. On his desk was a brass menorah and on a wall were black-and-white framed photographs of chassidic Jews in full traditional garb.

A philo-Semitic Catholic in his late 40s, he was born in Pulawy, a small town in eastern Poland, half of whose population was once Jewish. Yet, until he was 14, he had no idea that Pulawy was so heavily Jewish. "I knew literally nothing about Jews," said Makuch, a flamboyant man whose father was a member of the Communist party.

But then he met Michal Strzemski, a Polish professor who clued him in on Poland's rich Jewish legacy. "He was my rabbi, my melamed. It was the turning point in my life."

Immersing himself in things Jewish, Makuch became a devotee, if not a maven, in Judaica. "Jewish culture is my world," he said in an interview. "It's inside me, though I'm not Jewish. I couldn't be who I am without this culture."

Makuch, who speaks a little Yiddish and Hebrew and visits Israel and New York City regularly, launched the first Jewish Cultural Festival in 1988, just a year before Poland made its peaceful transition from communism to democracy and joined the western alliance.

"It was a dark time in terms of the political situation in Poland," he said. "When I started the festival, I did not think, or dream, that it would evolve into what it is today."

The debut festival, featuring a symposium on Polish-Jewish relations, was a modest affair of short duration and attracted about 1,000 people. Succeeding festivals took place every other year until the annual format was established. By one estimate, some 25,000 tickets have been sold at recent festivals.

In addition to familiarizing Poles with the beauty and range of Jewish culture, Makuch's overarching objective is to foster a sense of pluralism in a nation that is now so ethnically homogeneous.

"Poland was created not only by Poles, but by Jews, Ukrainians, Russians and Germans. This is the key to understanding the real culture of Poland," said Makuch, who conveyed the impression that he mourns the passing of prewar pluralistic Poland. (Due to border changes after 1945, Poland is more than 90 per cent ethnically Polish today).

Although he revels in and promotes Jewish culture as perhaps no other person in contemporary Poland, Makuch knows that the past is problematic and soaked in tragedy.

"I realize I live in the shadow of Auschwitz, in a Jewish graveyard. But at the festival, I don't focus on the Holocaust. Is six years of Jewish trauma during the Holocaust more important than almost 1,000 years of Jewish history in Poland?"

He added, "I'm trying to create a space of remembrance of what we have lost. The murder of so many Jews is a great loss for Poland. We lost almost everything."

Comedian known for his politically incorrect videos

By PAUL TELNER & BYRON PASCOE
Special to The CJN

Ari Shaffir got his comedy start in junior high telling Eddie Murphy jokes he passed off as his own.

"I didn't really understand them, but tried to steal them as my own. People would say, 'Yeah, we know its Eddie Murphy.' So I just learned how to make jokes on my own."

Two decades later, he's made a name for himself as one of today's most extreme comedians. He's popular on the standup circuit and online for his politically incorrect, viral series of videos titled The Amazing Racist.

In The Amazing Racist, Shaffir goes after one or several nationalities at a time. Instead of relying on the safety of the TV screen, which allows people to change the channel, or the stage, where the most you can get is heckled, Shaffir goes, with a videographer, into the communities of those he's comically offending .

He admits to getting scared while shooting the videos and he has received some death threats.

"Some were so stupid, too. Someone said, 'I don't know I'm a Jew.' I'm like 'Dude, yes, I do know I'm a Jew. I clearly look Jewish. No one looks Jewyer than me.' If you can't see the irony of a Jew making fun of Judaism, then clearly the joke is lost on you," Shaffir said.

"There are a lot of Jews who are really funny, but I don't know why there are so many Jews in show business. I wouldn't think a Jewish mother would be like, 'Go to Hollywood, be an actor.'That's not a normal thing. My Jewish mother said, 'No, don't do that, go to law school.'"

When Shaffir decided to pursue comedy, his parents were worried. "I tried to explain to my mother that the big deal here is getting into [the Los Angeles standup comedy club] The Comedy Store. She asked how much money you get to start. I said, 'It's a nominal fee of $15. She's like, 'Shaffir, you can't survive on $15 a night.' I said, 'Yeah, mom, I know that. It's an honour to get in.' Once she saw me on TV commercials, she was calmer."

He describes his standup act as pretty filthy, which is why for his upcoming Just For Laughs debut in Montreal, he's part of The Nasty Show.

Ari Shaffir

With respect to Michael Jackson or any person who has passed away, Shaffir doesn't believe there's a certain of amount of time you need to wait to make a joke about that person, "as long as you do it right.

"At memorial services, people will make a light-hearted joke about the person and everyone laughs. It breaks the tension. You can also make a bad joke, which is uncomfortable," he said.

"Once you start putting limits on things, then you get in trouble. All comedy comes from the same place. You reach down and try something you think is funny. It might be. It might not be, but you need to try."

With Sacha Baron Cohen's film Brüno starting its run, people are wondering about the future of the reality comedy genre. "Hopefully, it's going to a place where it isn't going to make the people you're pranking happy," Shaffir said. "That's the idea of a prank... messing with someone. Sometimes that's the joke, that it was mean."

Shaffir is looking forward to seeing Bill Cosby and Judy Gold at Just for Laughs. He said he used to have a crush on Gold.

He'll be able to catch her at Montreal's Centaur Theatre from July 21 to 25 in her one-woman show Judy Gold is Mommy Queerest, where she'll cover such subjects as Jewish mothers, anti-depressants, nursing homes, parenting, gay marriage, and her two sons.

As for Shaffir, he's performing in The Nasty Show at Club Soda from July 14 to 19, and then again on July 23. He's also performing in the same venue at the festival's variety show, Bubbling with Laughter, on July 21 in Montreal.

TEL AVIV MUSEUM RECONSTRUCTS 1907 BERLIN EXHIBIT

This 1906 painting by Maurycy Minkowski called Yom Kippur is one of several paintings included in the Tel Aviv Museum of Art reconstruction of an original exhibit held in Berlin in 1907. The original show featured more than 200 works of paintings, sculpture and Judaica. Among the noted artists represented were Jozef Israels, Lesser Ury, Camille Pissarro, Maurycy Gottlieb and Samuel Hirszenberg. The Berlin show sought to answer the questions "Do the Jews have an artistic talent?" and "Do their works have something in common?" The current exhibit in Tel Aviv, Fragmented Mirror, has about 100 pieces by the same artists and many of the same works featured in the original exhibition. This is a wonderful and rare opportunity to see works otherwise hidden away in storerooms. The show runs until October 2009. For more information, visit www.tamuseum.com.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN: REMEMBERING SCREENWRITER ROBERT RISKIN

Certainly you've seen some of the movies that he wrote – the list includes Lady for a Day (1933), It Happened One Night (1934), Mr. Deeds Goes to Town (1936), Lost Horizon (1937), You Can't Take It With You (1938) and Meet John Doe (1941) – but you may be forgiven if you don't recognize the name of screenwriter Robert Riskin.

Although Riskin (1897-1955) was in the public eye for much of his remarkable 10-year collaboration with film director Frank Capra, and also had a media spotlight trained on him because of his marriage to actress Fay Wray, he was in many ways a sort of invisible man when it came to getting due credit for his cinematic contributions.

The most important American filmmaker of the '30s, Capra could easily have afforded to share some of the glory with Riskin, his chief screenwriter and creative partner, which would have been the fair and gentlemanly thing to do. Instead, in his later years, Capra did all he could to diminish and obscure the extent of Riskin's contributions to his films.

It was Riskin, for example, who wrote the screenplay for American Madness (1932), their much-admired first joint effort, a film that was said to set the Capra style, which combined social commentary and analysis of American values. But Capra later asserted that he came up with the idea for and co-wrote the screenplay, a claim that his biographer, Joseph McBride, in concurrence with other film historians, has dismissed as "blatantly false."

Similarly and incredibly, Capra once claimed to have forgotten the name of the screenwriter of Lady for a Day. In many such incidents he practised what McBride calls "a carefully cultivated amnesia." Largely as a consequence, cinematic scholars have engaged in a lively debate about the degree of Riskin's contributions to Capra's impressive oeuvre.

A recent biography – In Capra's Shadow: The Life & Career of Screenwriter Robert Riskin, by Ian Scott (University of Kentucky Press) – attempts to set the record straight by giving Riskin his full and proper due.

"Unfortunately, as the years have passed and histories of Hollywood have been written, Riskin's career has been characterized in a manner that too often gives him a 'bit part' and an ad hoc status," Scott writes. "Yet his towering presence as a screenwriter of great skill and tremendous energy was legendary in film circles.

"In his heyday of the mid-'30s, emerging talents like Billy Wilder flocked to Riskin's office at Columbia Pictures, eager for tips and advice that he was only too willing to impart. His writing struck a chord with contemporary scenarists and audiences alike, because he managed to capture the essence of the vernacular, the everyday asides that were part of ordinary people's conversation and that brought his narratives to life."

Scott refers to "a determined propaganda effort on Capra's part to write Riskin out of the story, virtually from day one of their partnership," and suggests that the director's campaign had been largely effective.

Riskin was born in New York's Lower East Side in 1897 to Jewish parents who had escaped tsarist Russia. As a young teenager, he used to sneak into vaudeville playhouses and write down the many jokes and sketches he heard, utilizing his self-taught Pitman shorthand. He took an early job with Heidenheim and Levy, a large shirt-making company whose managers invested in films as a sideline and sent Riskin at age 17 to Florida to run a film production company. The lad was soon churning out one- and two-reel comedies, a pastime that continued until he enlisted in the U.S. army to fight in World War I.

Back in New York after the war, he and a writing partner achieved some success with Broadway plays. He honed his craft for a decade until the stock market crashed and many Broadway stages fell dark; he then relocated to Hollywood. It helped that his "sense of sleek, tight dialogue was a perfect match for the emerging sound era and the need to tell stories with an economy of effort," Scott observes.

Of course, anyone who has seen Capra and Riskin's back-to-back cinematic triumphs, Lady for a Day and It Happened One Night, already knows that these are two of the most perfectly crafted films ever made. Both artists were nominated for but did not win Academy Awards for Lady for a Day. However, It Happened One Night became the first film ever to sweep all five major categories of the awards, and Oscars went to Capra for best director, Riskin for best writer, and to actors Clark Gable and Claudette Colbert and Columbia studio head Harry Cohn.

The idea for Lady for a Day came from a magazine story by Damon Runyon, who publicly thanked Riskin for the huge improvement he made to his sketch-like story. It Happened One Night was based on a magazine story by Samuel Hopkins Adams, which Riskin vastly expanded upon and improved.

Lady for a Day is one of a small number of films that I can watch repeatedly. Perhaps it is a sappy fairy tale, but there is something comically marvellous in the way that major figures of New York's criminal underworld join in common purpose with the mayor, governor and police chief and their wives to help a pathetic street peddler named Apple Annie (played brilliantly by May Robson) masquerade as a high-society matron long enough to insure her daughter's marriage to the son of a visiting Spanish count.

If Lady for a Day is about a person from the lower depths of society being magically elevated into its highest reaches, It Happened One Night tells the story of a would-be heiress (Claudette Colbert) in society's highest echelons, who, through comic misadventure, descends into the common everyday world of ordinary Americans, where she finds true love (Clark Gable). Both tales culminate in marriage, the hallmark of every romantic comedy.

Late in his life, Capra attempted to remake Lady for a Day, but with woeful results. The new film, titled A Pocketful of Miracles, "ran 50 minutes longer than the taut, perfectly constructed Lady for a Day," Scott writes, and "only fleetingly recaptured past glories and paled in comparison with its delightful predecessor." It was on that ignominious note that Capra ended his career.

Riskin's relationship with Capra, a cinematic giant in his own right, served as "the camouflage hiding Riskin's monumental contribution to Hollywood," Scott writes.

Thankfully, more than half a century after the screenwriter's passing, In Capra's Shadow deservedly restores some of the lustre to his much-forgotten legend.

From Toronto to Tinseltown: an actor's story

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The last time she went, actor Lauren Lipson was unable to remain in Hollywood because of work permit limitations. But that wasn't the real reason she couldn't stay.

Lipson, 29, a Jewish Toronto native, first set down in La-La Land five years ago, but admits she didn't have the proper mindset to make it work, even had she stayed.

"The girl that left for Hollywood and the girl that came home were two different people," Lipson told Heebonics in a recent interview.

Though she's not a "big name" actor – Lipson started acting at 16 and has since worked on a number of commercials, had small roles on Little Mosque on the Prairie and The Line, and lent her voice to characters on the animated show 6 Teen, Total Drama Island and Stoked – the self-described "typical York Mills and Bayview kid" has renewed aspirations of acting success in California.

Lauren Lipson

That's not to say she thinks it will be easy, just easier than her last attempt, because she no longer has the same youthful arrogance she had before.

"For so long I wanted to be an actor, to be recognized and loved," she said. "Now, I just want to give back, help people and do my part in this world. And my way to do that is through acting. I know this is where I have to be."

A natural willowy redhead, Lipson's ethereal looks should serve her well upon her re-entry to the Hollywood scene later this year, though she said she knows that in a town crazy for youth, her age may work against her. Still, she remains undaunted.

"If I feel my integrity and values are being compromised, I won't work on a film," Lipson stated. "You gotta make smart choices [as an actor]."

While she hopes to be cast alongside big-name actors and work with established directors, Lipson said she isn't concerned about achieving instant success. She just wants to carve out a happy niche for herself in her chosen career.

"In 10 years, I see myself still strong. Maybe with kids, married and feeling like I made a difference and contributed to society," she said. "I just want to be happy with friends and family around. I can see myself living on a big ranch, with mountains."

Speaking of which, Lipson said that while she may be moving stateside to advance her career interests, she will always call Toronto home.

"I love Canada, but I'm also a traveller," she confided.

Would she consider playing Jewish roles if they come her way?

"Absolutely!" Lipson exclaimed, adding that while she didn't grow up observant, her heritage is very important to her and she would love to honour it by portraying a Jewish character.

"My favourite movie is [the Woody Allen directed] Annie Hall. It blends comedy and drama... to be in something like that would be great," she said.

Beyond acting, Lipson said she's also taken inspiration from her earlier travails and has begun writing her own screenplay, tentatively titled Swirly Girl, about her "lost days" of a few years back.

She won't go into details about plot or characters, but said it's "a coming-of-age dramedy." And the experience has made her much more sympathetic to the work of the screenwriter.

"I'll never look at a script the same way again," she said, laughing.

Looking back on her career thus far, Lipson said there's one major piece of advice she can give to aspiring actors: believe in yourself.

"Don't let anyone... make you feel they need to break you down in order to build you back up into this great actress. That is all an illusion. You are a great actress as you are. You just need the confidence to know that, and build upon it," she said.

Lipson said that she learned learned this the hard way, having attended numerous acting classes that sought to deconstruct her acting abilities to try and fit her into a preconceived acting mould.

After graduating with a bachelor of fine arts from York University in 2004, Lipson said she was "burnt out" from acting lessons and pushed herself to be someone she was not, all out of self-applied pressure.

In a letter she wrote about her early-20s malaise, Lipson described a penchant for self-destruction.

"After graduation I had a series of lacklustre auditions, and I fuelled all my creative and artistic instincts into my social life," she wrote. "I did book a few things here and there, but there was no real passion. All the potential was there fired up from school – the anger, the hurt, the sadness. I had a wealth of new emotional range, but I was pouring it into the wrong vessel.

"During my prime years for work, I was either in school getting beaten down or out of school beating myself down. It was a vicious cycle. My confidence was shattered, and my gears were stuck in neutral."

Lipson has come a long way since those self-doubting days, and this summer she'll re-board a plane to Tinseltown, secure in the knowledge that she has all the acting chops she needs to make it, and following her own advice to "follow your heart and go after your dreams."

Author memorializes his mother in a richly transcendent work

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Soon after her arrival in Canada in 1940, Masha Roskies sat down to a meal at her sister-in-law's house in Montreal and, seeing that only "Canadian bread" (the white, fluffy stuff called Wonder Bread) was on the table, asked for a piece of real bread instead.

When her aunt curtly replied that "this was what one ate in Canada, and she might as well get used to it," Masha – according to one version of the story – burst out crying, already longing for the thick black breads of her Vilna youth.

David G. Roskies tells the story in Yiddishlands (Wayne State University Press), his recent prize-winning memoir that memorializes his late mother, Masha, and lovingly recalls her well-storied life and family's past in a series of interwoven chapters that focus initially on her life and then shift into his own.

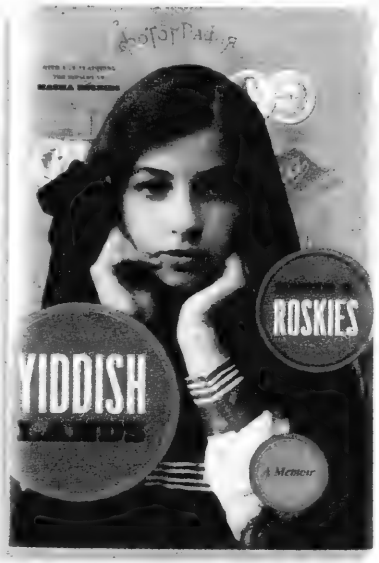
Born in Montreal in 1948, David Roskies seems to have inherited his mother's reverence for Yiddish culture, as well as her sense that all Canadian bread and experience pales in comparison to the vital and richly fulfilling Yiddish life once lived in Europe.

The story goes that the first thing David heard at birth was his mother singing The Rebbe Elimeylekh, one of hundreds of Yiddish folk songs that she carried in her head: a trove of musical culture that YIVO researchers would one day be thrilled to record. Thus was "Dovidl's" introduction to the world of Lithuanian Jewish culture that surrounded him as a child, and about which he eventually became so knowledgeable and proficient that at 15 the great Yiddishist Max Weinreich would tell him: "Fraynd Roskes, di yidishforshung darf aykh hobn, the field of Yiddish needs you."

From an early age, David understood "that time was riven in two: Time Before Time After. When Mother said, 'dos iz geshen in fertsikstn yor, such-and-such took place in the 40th year,' I knew she was referring not just to 1940 but to an entire Red Sea of circumstances by which the Old World stood divided from the New… Mother was the only link across the abyss of time. Like Moses on Mount Nebo."

Masha's mother, Fradl Matz, gave birth to some 10 children by her first husband before being widowed, then remarried and gave birth to Masha in 1906. Besides taking care of her large family, Fradl ran the Matz Press, the family publishing house that produced prayer books, Bibles and popular Yiddish literature. In a chapter titled "Prayer for the Tsar," David Roskies describes the great dilemma the Matz Press faced after the Germans occupied Vilna and demanded that the company remove the prayer for the tsar from its prayer books.

Stealth was required, since complying with the order would have been considered an act of disloyalty to the previous Russian regime, therefore punishable should the Russians regain power. Entrusted to the secretive task, nine-year-old Masha excised the pages from each book cleanly and skilfully with a straight razor. As if on a quest for a holy grail, David as a grown man always sought out one of the Matz Press' prayer books with the pages missing whenever he visited a synagogue in eastern Europe or Russia, hoping to bring it home as a memento for his mother. Eventually he found one.



Because Masha Roskies was "a patroness of the Yiddish arts such as Montreal had never seen," David is able to tell numerous stories about such prominent Yiddish writers as Isaac Bashevis Singer, Melekh Ravitch, Itsik Manger, Avrom Sutzkever and Rachel Korn. In a chapter titled "The Soiree," he recaptures the literary-salon atmosphere of his family's living room on the occasions when it was filled with the likes of Ravitch, Chava Rosenfarb, I. J. Segal and other writers, poets and lovers of the Yiddish arts.

One of the visitors to their home was Yiddish novelist Chaim Grade, to whom Masha once said, "Before she died, Fradl, my saintly mother said, 'Ale erevs zenen sheyn, all the eves in life are beautiful: the eves of the Sabbath, of the festivals, the eve of an engagement. Nor der erev toyt iz biter, the eve of one's death – that alone is dreadful."

Upon hearing this, Grade became excited, jumped up and proclaimed, "Masha, if you don't commit this to writing, I will – in my very next novel." But despite such encouragements, Masha never wrote anything. She always claimed she was too busy – promoting Yiddish theatre, helping to send Yiddish typewriters to Holocaust survivors overseas, arranging literary soirées, and immersing her four children in the culture that she loved so deeply.

Yiddishlands is a richly transcendent piece of writing that salvages many episodes of personal, family and social history, not only in old Europe but modern Montreal and numerous other places (hence the plural title). Sometimes reading these pages seems a bit like biting into a thickly buttered piece of black bread: there is so much nourishment here that it must be digested slowly. The somewhat Proustian writing style and layered personal associations may cause the reader to study and puzzle over some paragraphs long after first reading.

David's sister, Ruthie, also figures occasionally in these pages; together, they have done their parents proud by helping to carry forward the Yiddish legacy to another generation. David is an esteemed professor of Yiddish literature at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York and Ruthie – Ruth Wisse – is an acclaimed writer and professor of Yiddish literature and comparative literature at Harvard University.

"I started writing this book the day I got up from shivah after my mother died," David told The CJN after accepting the prize for Yiddish literature at the recent Canadian Jewish Book Awards in Toronto. "It was a way of keeping her alive. As long as I was writing the book, I was still in conversation with her. When that draft was over, I could finally let go."

At the awards ceremony, Roskies concluded his acceptance speech by singing a Yiddish song from his mother's repertoire that was first sung in Vilna in 1919. Similarly, his book also gives his mother the last word: attached to the inside back cover is a CD recording of 10 Yiddish songs as sung "a cappella" by Masha Roskies for the YIVO Institute.

World Jewish Hockey Tournament scores

By SHEILA SIMMONS
Special to The CJN

METULLA, Israel — It took the words of John Allen, Canadian ambassador to Israel, to put into strange perspective what it is to play high-level hockey in Israel in July.

"I grew up in Winnipeg," Allen said at the opening of the second World Jewish Hockey Tournament on July 3. "And I played hockey outdoors in minus-40 weather. What I never expected to see was hockey being played indoors with plus-40 weather outdoors."

It was foggy at times, with cold ice meeting the hot Israeli air, but players from nine teams and five countries – Canada, the United States, Israel, France and Russia – opened the WJHT at the Canada Centre in the northernmost spot in Israel, just a slapshot away from the hills of Lebanon.

The tournament ran from July 3 to 14.

In fact, whatever expectations there were for the 10-day event were surpassed on its very first day, with two heart-stopping, remarkable overtime games involving both of the Canadian junior teams.

"It was as good a day of hockey as I've ever seen," said Sherry Bassin, the general manager of all the Canadian teams participating here. "The level of play, the emotion in the building, the calibre of the competition was indeed memorable."

In the first junior game, Israel had a 4-2 lead over the Canadian Red team in the third period, but couldn't hold the lead. David Freiman of Toronto, who captained the Toronto Penguins Midget A team to a Toronto city hockey championship, displayed his leadership with a game-tying goal with just 37 seconds to play.

The great Canada-U.S. hockey rivalry played out in front of a large crowd at the Canada Centre, with Canada White coming from behind to defeat the Americans by shootout, a 3-2 victory. Again, a very strong U.S. team led 2-1 in the third period before Matt Silcoff of Thornhill, Ont., tied the game.

After a scoreless overtime, the game went to a shootout. Adam Levine of Toronto scored a shootout goal and the winner was potted by Noah Schwartz, who plays for the Hamilton Junior Red Wings during the winter.

"I've been involved in a lot of overtime games in my day, but this was a memorable game," said Steve Thomas, the Canada White coach, who knows a little about overtime himself, as he once held the National Hockey League record for overtime goals. "The kids really came up big for us."

The opening day of junior play put a huge smile on the face of Sidney Greenberg, the Canadian chairman of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation and the brains behind this year's World Jewish Tournament. Two years ago, Greenberg ran a small four-team, four-country event in Metulla. This year, it has expanded to two divisions and more than twice the number of teams and players. It's Greenberg's vision to build and develop hockey in Israel and grow the sport and its athletes at the very same time.

Two years ago, this tournament began with almost no notice and was played in front of few fans. This year, the media attention alone – famed TSN broadcaster Brian Williams, the Globe and Mail and the Jerusalem Post all reported on this year's event – made it notable.

Josh Tordjman

"I never knew there were this many good Jewish hockey players," said Bassin. "I used to joke, 'Jews own teams, they don't play for them.' Well now, that's changing. We have a lot of us who can play."

Jewish-born players such as Michael Cammalleri, who recently signed with the Montreal Canadiens, and Eric Nystrom of the Calgary Flames show it's possible for Jews to play big-time hockey.

Here in Metulla, the goaltender on the Canadian senior team was Josh Tordjman, the only player in the tournament who has played in the NHL. He played two games for the Phoenix Coyotes this past season and hopes to play more in the future.

Tordjman had a shutout in his first start here, a 4-0 Canadian win over Israel.

"It's an honour to be in this tournament and it's a privilege to play in Israel," Tordjman said. "When I heard about this event, I didn't give it a second thought. I wanted to be here, and from what I've seen so far, I'm thrilled with the choice I've made. I couldn't be more excited about this event. It's everything I love. Hockey, Canada, Israel. What's not to love about that?"

F1 boss apologizes for Hitler remark

JTA

BERLIN — The chief of Formula 1 racing has apologized for remarks he made praising Adolf Hitler.

"Those who don't know me think I support Hitler's atrocities. Those who do know me have told me how unwise I was to articulate my points so badly that it should have been so widely misunderstood," Bernie Ecclestone told the Times of London and the Jewish Chronicle last week.

"I'm just sorry I was an idiot. I sincerely, genuinely apologize," he said.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) called for Ecclestone's resignation after he praised Hitler for having "gotten things done."

In an interview in the British newspaper the Times, Ecclestone said "Hitler got taken away and persuaded to do things that I have no idea whether he wanted to do or not… [but at least] he could command a lot of people able to get things done." He also said Hitler "wasn't a dictator," and reserved a few choice words for democracy, which he felt "hasn't done a lot of good for many countries, including [England]. I like people who make up their minds."

Ecclestone also said Saddam Hussein, the executed former dictator of Iraq, "was the only one who could control that country."

In response, WJC president Ronald Lauder said Ecclestone was "question[ing] the basic principles of modern democracy." Lauder urged racing teams and host countries to "suspend their co-operation with Mr. Ecclestone and call for his resignation."

The British-born Ecclestone, 78, insisted he was misunderstood. He said he had merely said Hitler "had effectively tackled unemployment and the economic crisis before committing his horrendous crimes."

Ecclestone added he had many Jewish friends who would know that he would never deliberately hurt a member of a minority group.

Friends forever?

NEW TO CANADA

By NINA SHENHAV

"Promise you'll call!" Lisa begs while passionately holding my hand.

"I promise!" I respond emotionally. (Hold on, do I have her phone number? Oh, there she goes, saying she'll call me.)

"I'm calling you first thing in the morning," Lisa says. "We'll have lunch!"

Later, in the car with my husband, I am bubbling with excitement. "It's been a great evening," I start enthusiastically. "I liked the party and the people, and Lisa is great, and her friend, Jane, is great too. See? I have two new best friends. And you said Canadians aren't friendly! We're even meeting tomorrow for lunch."

Meir seems pleased for me.

First thing the next morning I reschedule a meeting to make room for my new friend, Lisa. At the end of the day, I kind of gather we won't be meeting for lunch after all. She doesn't call the next day either, or the week after that.

Even Meir admits it's strange. "The way she and Jane were hugging you at the end of the party, I was sure they're yours to keep."

Then I realize that Lisa must have lost my phone number! It's that simple.

"Then call her, by all means," Meir encourages me.

"But I don't have her number."

We don't talk for awhile. "How about calling Jane, her best friend? She said you were a beautiful, creative girl. Ask her for Lisa's number," Meir suggests.

"No. I don't want her to be jealous."

I won't bore you with the tale of my exhausting quest for Lisa's number. What matters is that I finally get to call my long lost friend: "Lisa! Honey!" I can't hold my excitement. "So you've lost my number, but no worries, I'm here!" I exclaim.

In return, I get silence, and then a cold, polite voice: "Who is it, please?"

"Uh… it's Nina."

No response.

I try again, this time less confidently: "Nina. From the party last week? You said I was adorable."

Lisa defrosts a little, thank goodness. "Oh, yes, hello. How are you?"

I'm sort of happy again. "I'm great! So, you said we'd have lunch. Wanna get together today?"

Lisa replies cautiously: "No, I am sorry, but I'm terribly busy. Terribly."

Well, guess what? Lisa's terribly busy all week, all month, and there are even implications about the whole year.

Meir hugs me while I sob. "It's not the first time something like this has happened to us in Canada," he reminds me. "We've met people here who promised us they'd be with us forever, and we've never heard from them since."

He's right. It's just that I really felt Lisa and I had something going. She showed interest in me, in the same way she showed interest in her best friend, the Canadian, Jane.

"Call Jane," Meir advises. "Maybe she'll explain it to you. Maybe you've somehow hurt Lisa. She's her best friend. Call and find out."

I have Jane's number, so I call her. At the end of the creepy phase of identification, Jane finally remembers who I am. Still, she can't recall who Lisa is.

You see, it's not me being me, or even me being an Israeli. Turns out, Lisa and Jane also met at that party, became "best friends" for a moment, and never really considered continuing the bond.

I guess Canadians do want to be friends forever. The problem is it's kind of forgotten the moment they say their goodbyes. Do correct me if I'm wrong!

FITNESS CORNER

By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Summer is here, and it's great to see people outside running, walking, biking and rollerblading with their dogs.

We all know that dogs are a man's best friend, but did you know that owning a dog can not only prolong your life but improve the quality of your health as well?

Having a pet – a cat or a dog specifically – helps reduce the amount of stress the body feels every day. The newest research shows that caring for a cat or dog helps reduce blood pressure and lower cholesterol. Just petting a cat can bring down blood pressure levels in stressful situations.

Owning a dog also tends to encourage daily exercise and increase the development of social contacts. Both are known to have a positive effect on your mental and physical health. Regular walks are a huge benefit to your health and overall wellness, and by walking regularly at the intensity and distance of a typical dog walk, you reduce stress and burn extra calories as well as increasing your cardiovascular health.

Recent studies have found that dog owners not only have lower blood pressure and cholesterol levels, they also tend to suffer fewer medical problems, a situation that is also linked to regular increased physical activity. Since a dog needs to be walked and played with as part of its daily care, most dog owners don't have a problem getting out with their pet in any type of weather.

Furthermore, studies have found that seniors with pets cope better with stress on a daily basis and tend not to enter the health-care system as often as their non-pet-owner counterparts.

A study out in Hartwick University in New York went so far as to say that having a dog or cat in childhood can boost the immune system, and children with cats or dogs have been found to miss less school than their peers without pets at home.

So if you want to lose weight and feel great, go get a dog!

Hometown girl makes a difference

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Judy lives in a world – in fact, she creates one – where she sees skepticism about "the other" and determines to find an opportunity to unravel stereotypes and bridge differences.

URBAN WRITER

Since Sept. 11, 2001, Judy, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, has been the director of community outreach and partnership with the Canadian Centre for Diversity (CCD), an organization whose vision is to create a Canadian society without prejudice or discrimination and instead to celebrate diversity, difference and inclusion.

In this position, Judy has opened many eyes to the injustice of mistruths about religions, nations and ethnicities. She has accomplished this through such efforts as a program called Discovering Diversity, a powerful, full-day, guided outing for students in grades 1 to university, when Jews visit mosques and churches, and Muslims drop by synagogues and churches.

"You watch as the children become more and more relaxed and recognize the similarities between us as the day progresses," Judy says. "They come away comforted that people are not so different."

Judy tells a story about a Jewish day school student who was about to enter a mosque and said, "I'm terrified they will kill me."

She calmed the Grade 8 student and encouraged him to sit with her. When he came out, he said, "I learned that Islam has similarities to Judaism and that I am very excited about my Jewishness."

"I'll never forget that day because he found value in others and his own faith," Judy says.

This year, Judy had Christians, Muslims and Hindus at her multi-faith Pesach seder. One of the guests approached her at the end of the seder, gave her a hug and told her she was a student at York University and very involved in Israeli Apartheid Week. She said she will no longer be part of that event.

Judy also creatively facilitated an exchange program, through the CCD, with students at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and the Islamic Foundation School. The Grade 5 students visited each other and sat in on classes and prayer sessions.

"I was proud of the staff, students and parents at Paul Penna. They approached me with the request, obviously seeing [that] we can't live and die in a bubble on Bathurst Street."

There are many quiet emissaries of peace in our society, but few who have engaged in courageous "diversity" work in places like Damascus, Syria. Judy is one of these people.

From Jan. 16 to 28, as a guest of the Canadian Embassy, she visited Syria with internationally renowned peace activist Hind Kabawat. There, during the war on Gaza, she held workshops on women's issues, including prejudice, racism and diversity. On Day 2, she showed the participants the film Pigeon, a short documentary on the Holocaust and empathy. It was well accepted.

"My parents didn't want me to go, but I was never concerned about my safety," Judy says.

"When the participants did the evaluation, the thing they enjoyed the most was meeting me – a Jew. They were blown away that I was just another women with similar issues.

"On the first day, I told them, 'I am a proud of being a Jewish woman.'"

She feels, however, that the most important statement she made on Jewish-Arab relations came simply from her showing up. "Now these Syrian woman have finally met a Jew and harbour a different understanding of who we are.

"As a child of survivors, I could have remained bitter, and look at everybody as an enemy of the Jewish People and Israel. I chose instead to live outside of that mindset and that is why I do what I do."

FAREWELL MACCABIAH: The 18th "Chai" Maccabiah Games wrapped up last week with colourful closing ceremonies at the amphitheatre in Latrun. Singing, dancing and fireworks marked the closing event, enjoyed by many of the 7,000 athletes from 54 countries who participated in the Games. Israeli President Shimon Peres proclaimed the Games "the best Maccabiah ever" and urged the athletes to consider making Israel their permanent home. Peres named U.S. Olympic gold-medal swimmer Jason Lezak and Hungarian chess player Judit Polgar the Games' outstanding performers. Lezak, 33, set a Maccabiah record in the 100-metre freestyle with a time of 47.78 seconds. Polgar, also 33, has been a grandmaster since age 15 – the youngest player ever to receive the designation – and is ranked 36th in the world, making her the only woman in the top 100. Options on Iran still on table: Barak

JERUSALEM — Israel is keeping on the table all the options regarding a response to Iran's nuclear program, Defence Minister Ehud Barak told visiting U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates on Monday.

Barak said that a military strike is still a possibility, even as Washington tries to persuade Israel to give diplomacy more time.

"We clearly believe that no option should be removed from the table. This is our policy. We mean it. We recommend to others to take the same position, but we cannot dictate it to anyone," Barak told reporters as he stood alongside Gates during a Jerusalem press conference.

Israeli officials have said little about what military action they might have in mind. But the country has conducted a number of military exercises widely seen as possible preparations, including long-range air force manoeuvres and recent movement of Israeli warships and submarines through the Suez Canal, the quickest route to the Persian Gulf from Israel.

But priority should be given to diplomacy and possibly tougher sanctions against Iran, Barak said.

Gates' visit to Israel was partially aimed at dissuading Israel from taking any military action and buying time for U.S. diplomacy to bear fruit. However, the fact that Barak repeated his no-options-off-the-table comment three times seemed to indicate Gates made no visible headway in getting Israel to soften its line.

Still, the comments did not signal a major rift with the United States, which has also said there is a time limit for its diplomatic outreach. Israel has shown little enthusiasm for a global diplomatic effort that so far has failed to persuade Tehran to curb its nuclear program.

The News in Brief

Canada

Boycott Thwarted

TORONTO — Toronto Jews responded with their wallets to charges the Royal Ontario Museum's exhibit of the Dead Sea Scrolls is illegal. More than 500 tickets to the exhibit were sold on the July11-12 weekend after an e-mail warning from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto that pro-Palestinian groups want the exhibit closed. Palestine House and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid say it's illegal because Israel looted the "Palestinian artifacts" in the 1967 Six Day War. Palestine House said it "boycotts the exhibition unless the ROM admits the factual history that these scrolls are Palestinian property." On July 10, 30 people protested outside the Israeli Consulate across the street from the museum. The Jewish Defence League responded with a small counter-rally. Pickets by the pro-Palestinian groups will continue and the campaign will "escalate," a spokesperson said. The federation's Sally Szuster said the e-mail urging Jews to see the Scrolls was modelled on a successful campaign last spring to thwart a boycott of Israeli wines on Passover.

World

Refugee Status Nixed

SAO PAULO — A Jerusalem rabbi who allegedly abused children won't receive refugee status in Brazil. The decision announced July 13 by Brazilian authorities means Rabbi Elior Chen, who heads a religious sect that allegedly abused children, could soon be extradited to Israel. He can appeal. An Israeli probe continues into allegations that his abuse of one woman's children led to two of them, aged 4 and 5, being hospitalized in March in critical condition and another, 3, remaining in a persistent vegetative state. The rabbi allegedly urged followers to abuse their children, including beatings and pouring household cleaners into open wounds, to "correct their corrupt souls." An international arrest warrant was issued for him in April.

Demjanjuk Trial Set

BERLIN —The Munich trial of alleged Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk is set to begin in mid-October. Demjanjuk, 89, is charged with being an accessory to the murder of 27,900 Jews in the gas chambers at the Sobibor death camp in Poland. The prosecution is expected to call 22 witnesses. Also, eight people from the Netherlands, the United States and Germany will testify against him, including concentration camp survivors and people who lost relatives in Sobibor. The Ukraine native spent most of the postwar period in the United States before being extradited to Germany in May. The retired auto worker lived in suburban Cleveland, but was stripped of his U.S. citizenship for lying about his Nazi past.

Agriprocessors Sale To Mtl. Man Approved

SHF Industries, a company formed in May by Canadian plastics manufacturer Hershey Friedman and his son-in-law, Daniel Hirsch, bought the failed kosher meat-packing plant for $8.5 million. The sale was approved July 20 by the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Iowa.

Friedman, an observant Jew, has said he plans to continue operating the business as a meat-packing plant focusing on kosher products. He told the Mishpacha Jewish Family Weekly that he hopes to have production up and running in time for the High Holidays.

The purchase price was well below the $22 million the plant owes to unsecured creditors, including back wages and benefits to hundreds of employees. It's also much less than the $40 million Soglowek Nahariya Ltd. of Israel was prepared to offer going into a March auction for the bankrupt company. Soglowek Nahariya rescinded its offer before the auction.

According to the Iowa Independent, SHF will pay $1.8 million in order to pay debts owed to First Bank Business Capital and MLIC Mortgage. Under conditions of the sale, the new owners don't have to pay off any other debts.

Agriprocessors, formerly the largest kosher meat producer in the United States, has been operating at a fraction of its capacity since a May 2008 raid that trained a national spotlight on the issue of illegal immigration. It also forced the Jewish community to grapple with issues relating to the ethical treatment of workers at Jewish-owned businesses. Several company officials have faced criminal charges for their roles in employing the illegal workers and other alleged violations.

Jewish link to York U 'absolutely essential'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

'The February incident was an ugly incident'

After an academic year that was rife with anti-Israel tensions, a three-month strike that shut down classes and a number of anti-Semitic incidents, York University president Mamdouh Shoukri spoke to The CJN about his wish to learn from the past and to move forward into a brighter future for York students.

Shoukri visited The CJN's offices last week to talk about recent challenges his school has faced due to heightened tensions between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students, and about his goal to improve the campus' learning environment and academic programs.

"The Jewish community has been an important constituency for York University in the past, they have been supporters of the university and the university has been supportive of the community. I think it is important – it is absolutely essential – that this continues into the future," he said.

"Anything that can be done to strengthen that relationship and alleviate misunderstanding is something that we will pursue."

He said that York has a reputation for being a campus that is "committed to social responsibility and social justice, diversity and accessibility" as well as having a student body with a particular interest in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"We do our best to ensure that the environment is safe and secure and people aren't intimidated. But incidents do happen," Shoukri said.

He referred specifically to one that took place on Feb. 11, when Jewish students were barricaded in the Hillel lounge by students who shouted anti-Zionist slogans. The incident was sparked by a press conference to announce a student-run initiative to have the York Federation of Students (YFS) executive members impeached for their inactivity during the three-month CUPE strike by teaching assistants and contract faculty last year.

Mamdouh Shoukri

"The February incident was an ugly incident. It was a case of intimidation of students who had every right to present their petition or the result of the petition they put together. It had nothing to do with the Arab-Israeli conflict and had everything to do with student government," Shoukri said.

"The university worked with the law enforcement agencies right away, and there were no charges laid by the law enforcement agencies, so we took it to the student code of conduct," Shoukri said.

In May, two students, one of whom is the incoming YFS president Krisna Saravanamuttu, were sanctioned by the university for their involvement in the incident.

"We do our best to protect our students, all our students, and ensure that we have an environment that is safe and secure and free from intimidation," Shoukri said.

"We have a zero-tolerance policy to any act of racism, anti-Semitism, intimidation to our students."

In response to a suggestion that York's administration should be more proactive in preventing incidents rather than reacting to them after the fact, and to one urging a change in policy to keep student demonstrations from disrupting classes, Shoukri said it's easy to talk about having a balance between student activism and safety and security, but it's difficult to put into practice.

"We don't want a campus with no activism – it wouldn't be York," he said. "The question becomes how to make sure that when [a demonstration] happens, that first of all, it doesn't disrupt other academic activities on campus. Second, how to make sure that when this happens, it is done in a way that is respectful of others."

JEWISH FUNERALS

"Know that the highest standard of observance is here for you, in times of sorrow."

Michael Benjamin

People often tell me our strict adherence to the principle of kavod ha-met, respect for the dead, reassures them that they are doing the right thing. Our devout Chevra Kadisha has operated since 1922. Every year, we commission a new keepsake plate for members – tangible evidence that they are part of the longest serving burial society in Toronto. You can see the plates from each of our 87 years in a cabinet in the chapel foyer.

AMIA

AMIA. It is a name we must all remember. And for all time. It is an acronym in Spanish for Asociación Mutual Israelita Argentina, the official name of the Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires.

There is also a serendipitous sense of double-entendre in "AMIA" with the Hebrew word am (people, or nation) that makes its place in our hearts especially poignant.

Thus the Spanish and the Hebrew languages felicitously combine in the single word AMIA (the Mutual Israelite Association of Argentina) to achieve a broader meaning that encompasses the more sweeping aspect of "my people" as well.

From the editor's desk...

Fifteen years ago, on July 18, a suicide bomber attacked the AMIA building and reduced it to a smouldering rubble of human and concrete carnage. The murderer wrought unimaginable horror and havoc upon the Jewish and wider communities of Buenos Aires, searing a permanent scar into the psyche and soul of Argentine, South American and world Jewry. Eighty-five people were killed, 151 were injured.

After more than a decade of exhausting, exhaustive, painstaking, even embarrassing investigation, Dr. Alberto Nisman, Argentina's attorney general, on Oct. 25, 2006, presented the findings of the special committee that had investigated the circumstances of the attack. The committee concluded that the attack against the AMIA had been carried out by Hezbollah.

But they also concluded that Hezbollah had not – indeed could not have – acted alone. The investigators concluded that "the decision to carry out the attack was made, not by a small splinter group of extremely radical Islamic functionaries, but was instead a decision that was extensively discussed and was ultimately adopted by a consensus of the highest representatives of the Iranian government at the time." (My emphasis)

In other words, the government of Iran was complicit in the murders.

As a result, some two weeks later in November, the judge handling the AMIA case issued international arrest warrants for seven senior Iranian officials, including then-president Hashemi Rafsanjani and senior Hezbollah operative Imad Moughnieh. (Moughnieh subsequently met his death in mysterious circumstances in a car bombing in Damascus.) One of the seven Iranians indicted – Mohsen Rezai – was a candidate in the recently held, fraudulent presidential elections in Iran.

According to the Intelligence and Terrorism Information Center at the Center for Special Studies in Israel, the Argentine investigators concluded that the fundamental reason for the attack against AMIA was the Argentine "government's unilateral decision to terminate the nuclear materials and technology supply agreements that had been concluded some years previously between Argentina and Iran."

In their report to the Argentine attorney general, the investigators described in detail how the Iranian leaders arrived at the decision to carry out the attack.

Two and a half years before the AMIA bombing – on March 17, 1992 – the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires was also bombed. Twenty-nine people were murdered then and some 300 were wounded.

The Israeli government has always maintained that Iran was responsible for both of the deadly attacks in Buenos Aires.

No one has yet been brought to justice for either attack.

To mark the sombre period surrounding the 15-year anniversary, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman went to Argentina as part of a 10-country visit to Latin America. It was the first such visit to the region by an Israeli cabinet minister in more than 20 years.

The government of Israel wanted to openly display its solidarity with and support for the Jewish community there. The centre has been rebuilt. The community did not wilt or bend to the malicious will of the sadistic and craven terrorists who are manipulated by the mullahs in Iran.

In addition, Lieberman spoke plainly about trying to counter Iran's growing influence in the area. He called Iran "the biggest sponsor of world terror organizations such as Hamas, [Islamic] Jihad and Hezbollah."

The people of Iran themselves know this to be true. We, in the West, must never forget this. We owe that to the people of Iran who, each day, demonstrate their courage against an evil and oppressive regime.

But we especially owe that debt of memory to the victims of the bombings in Buenos Aires. May "AMIA" always be a rallying cry recalling the bravery of the Jews of Argentina and stirring in our hearts the sense of peoplehood that terrorists can never understand, let alone defeat. May the memories of the terrorists' victims always be for blessing. – MBD

New CJC head aims to mend relations with left

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Some lead with words and bluster, while others lead by example.

Freiman, who assumed his post in May, succeeds immediate past co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol.

Speaking to The CJN at his home in Toronto earlier this month, Freiman spoke candidly about what he expects to bring to the presidency, stressing that his is a low-key approach.

"Congress depends on its lay leadership for guidance," he said. "The president, where appropriate, speaks on its behalf. I don't think it's sensible to turn anything into a cult of personality. CJC is important as a voice on behalf of the Jewish community. It's the organization that's important. It's the hard work of the professionals who work for Congress that accomplishes the goals that are set. I'm glad to lend my name to its good work."

That said, Freiman is well aware of the challenges faced by Jewish communities in both the Diaspora and in Israel, and in his soft-spoken way, he made it clear he's unafraid to face them.

He said what the community is seeing now is "a concerted effort to delegitimize the right of a Jewish state and homeland."

Beyond that, he said, the methods being used by anti-Semites and enemies of Israel have become more disingenuous than ever before.

"There are some people of goodwill who are being misled by clever, unprincipled propaganda," Freiman said. "But it can be stemmed. You have to meet this head on, find the right alliances, and call it what it is: anti-Semitism. [Then], you have to present a front as allies."

And he wants Jewish community members to realize they have many friends out there.

"The community has far more allies than one might think," he said. "Our opponents are in the minority. There is no doubt that the Jewish community has a challenge. But it's also a challenge for the enemies of Israel."

Mark Freiman

Born in a displaced persons camp in Soviet-occupied Vienna to Holocaust survivors, Freiman, 62, said Jewish identity and the future of Jewish community are of utmost importance to him and have always been a "background theme" in his life.

That's why he feels one of the best ways to ensure the continuity of the community is to secure alliances with other faith communities in what he perceives to be a "crucial time" for world Jewry.

Freiman – a lawyer by profession and a former deputy attorney general for Ontario, from 2000 to 2004, during which time he also held the portfolio of deputy minister responsible for native affairs – said he's in a position to help Congress in some of its "legal dimensions" if necessary.

He said he's worked on a number of human rights issues, including being chief counsel for the Canadian Human Rights Commission's case against infamous Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

"So I know a little bit about hate propaganda," Freiman said. "Congress being an advocacy organization, and me, who purports to be an advocate, it's probably a pretty good match."

Asked about initiatives he'd like to bring forward during his two-year tenure as president, Freiman immediately raised the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism, an all-party body announced in June that will research the state of anti-Semitism in Canada.

"Congress will be very active in presenting views to the inquiry and helping them do its work. I think it's a very worthwhile endeavour," Freiman said, adding that Congress will continue to be active in combatting organizations "who see fit to bring forth… anti-Semitic resolutions. We will try to educate and dissuade organizations from going down a path that they probably don't understand in its full dimensions."

Freiman was referring to some of the anti-Israel resolutions that have been drawn up by CUPE Ontario over the last few years.

"There are bridges to be built with the labour movement in Canada… a group that has traditionally been friendly and had good relations with the Jewish community. In general, there is a challenge in engaging the left wing in a positive way," he said.

"The Jewish community, recently, has managed to cultivate much better relations with the centre-right and now needs to turn its attention to maintaining good relations with the centre-left as well."

Asked how this can be achieved, Freiman said it was imperative for Congress to "work with the rank and file" of the union as well as with its leaders to find "opportunities for positive dialogue."

Volunteer seeks Israelis, Russians for Jewish veterans group

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As a Hungarian-native who survived the Holocaust as a hidden child and fought in Israel's War of Independence in 1948 before settling in Canada, George Stern believes that all Jewish war veterans living in Canada should be recognized and organized.

Stern, who has been a volunteer and member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada for about 10 years, has made it a personal mission to attract the hundreds of Israeli and Russian Jewish war veterans living in Canada to join his organization.

He said that when he first approached the group's board of directors and the president about including Jewish war veterans who fought for countries other than Canada, they were hesitant. But about a year ago, they agreed to reach out to Russian Jews who fought against the Nazis in World War II, as well as to Israeli Jews, who settled in Canada.

"They realized, that, first of all, Canadian veterans, unfortunately, every year there are less and less," Stern said, adding that if the organization wants to thrive 10 years from now, it needs to reach out to vets who fought in recent wars in Israel, such as the 1967 Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Stern said that within the Jewish War Veterans of Canada – which, according to its website, functions as a "Jewish veterans association with all rights to operate independently, to recognize and assist the State of Israel in any way possible"– there are many machalniks, volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence after serving in World War II.

"It's important for [Russians and Israelis] to join, because they don't have an organization at all. They have an organization for disabled soldiers, but it is only for the disabled. There is also an organization that sends gifts to [active Israeli] soldiers [the Association for Israeli Soldiers]," Stern said.

"I was searching for any office, anything for them, and there was no organization. That's why I wanted them to belong with us."

Stern, who is on the board of the ritual committee at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, has long been advocating for the recognition of Jewish war vets.

In November, his shul will be holding a special Shabbat service for Jewish war veterans for the fourth consecutive year, and this year, for the first time, it will specifically include Russian, as well as Israeli and Canadian, war vets.

"At the last Shabbat service at Beth Tikvah, there were 90-year old guys [veterans of World War II]. They came, thank God, and we were very glad, but every year there are less and less," he said.

Stern noted that a plan is in the works to build a monument in Toronto for Jewish Canadian veterans, whether they fought for Canada, Israel or Russia. (A $7-million project slated for Earl Bales Park and designed by renowned architect Daniel Libeskind was scrapped after veterans couldn't raise enough money. A scaled-down version is being envisioned as part of the redevelopment of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.)

"We don't want to include just the names of the soldiers who died, but people who fought the wars against the Nazis and the Independence war of Israel and all the wars," he said.

"We have something in common together."

Stern said that an acquaintance of his, a Russian war veteran, told him that the absence of an organization for Russian Jewish vets makes him feel alone.

"They feel like they don't belong. Everybody feels like they want to belong," Stern said.

The annual fee to be a member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada is $35.

For more information or to inquire about joining, call Stern at 416-223-7481, or e-mail g.stern@hotmail.com.

Hopes for dialogue with other groups

He added: "One has to be patient. But I'm a great believer that the truth does, in the end, win out. You simply have to be determined in making sure the truth is at the forefront."

When not wearing his professional hats, Freiman said he's an avid reader who also enjoys cooking and travelling.

"My secret guilty pleasure is in [doing] the New York Times crossword puzzle, in which I waste many, many hours," he admitted.

Freiman said that after his presidency is over, he hopes to have "consolidated the positive role of Congress as an advocate on behalf of Jewish interests… to have engaged constructively with groups both friendly and less friendly [to the community] to improve the relationships.

"I hope to have dialogued with other faith groups, including Muslim groups of goodwill, and I hope the themes that the parliamentary coalition on anti-Semitism is looking to explore, will have been explored both in that forum and in others. Because the fight against anti-Semitism is the most important thing we can be doing right now."

Jews, too, can live in undivided Jerusalem

The sharp and unabated criticism that the Obama administration has levelled against the presence of Jewish communities – or "settlements" as most people prefer to call them – beyond the Green Line of June 4, 1967, has been surprising as well as disappointing.

But the harsh, impatient castigation last week by the Americans of the proposed construction of some 20 residential units in the former Shepherd Hotel in the east Jerusalem neighbourhood of Sheikh Jarrah – property that was legally purchased almost 25 years ago by Jews and approved for development by appropriate municipal authorities – was shocking and deeply disturbing.

The United States demanded of Israel that the project be stopped. For the Obama government views Jewish life in east Jerusalem as it does other "settlements" and outposts in the West Bank: it is illegal and must be frozen, if not dismantled.

The imperious, peremptory tone of the U.S. State Department's missive was unexpected by the Israeli government. To its credit, it reacted respectfully but forcefully to the American dictate. At the very first cabinet meeting last week after the diplomatic note was received in Jerusalem, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet – and the world – that "Israel will not agree to edicts of this kind in east Jerusalem."

He elaborated.

"United Jerusalem is the capital of the Jewish people in the State of Israel, and our sovereignty over the city is not subject to appeal… Jerusalem residents can purchase apartments anywhere in the city. This has been the policy of all Israeli governments. There is no ban on Arabs buying apartments in the west of the city, and there is no ban on Jews building or buying in the city's east. This is the policy of an open city. I can only describe to myself what would happen if someone would propose that Jews could not live in certain neighbourhoods in New York, London, Paris or Rome. There would certainly be a major international outcry. Accordingly, we cannot agree to such a decree in Jerusalem."

As long as all residents are compelled to comply with lawfully enacted rules, regulations, standards and bylaws concerning the acquisition and development of property, it is inconceivable that Jews would be prohibited from living in any part of Jerusalem.

The U.S. administration did not demand that Arabs desist from living in west Jerusalem. It confounds the mind and troubles the heart that it called for Jews to desist from living in east Jerusalem.

Presidential candidate Barack Obama said that Jerusalem should not be divided. His government's summary decree regarding the development of the Shepherd Hotel is inconsistent with his campaign rhetoric. More important, however, it is inconsistent with the justice and the right of Jews too to live in an undivided and united Jerusalem.

25 years ago in The CJN

Revulsion and fear greeted the election to the Knesset of Rabbi Meir Kahane, the founder of the often-violent Kach party who had stridently advocated the expulsion of Israel's Arab population. His status as a Knesset member meant he would be immune from criminal prosecution.

She'arim was terminated

With horror, I read the opening sentence of the article "Former She'arim students thrive in first year of special program" (CJN, Jewish Toronto, July 9). It stated that "After Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School decided to close a year ago…" She'arim did not decide to close. It was terminated, destroyed, decimated.

I am thankful that the three schools mentioned in the article placed a number of the former students of She'arim, and I am more than delighted to hear stories of successes. But do not dare to imply that the closing of the school solved the problem of the many children in our community whose needs are now not being met. Tell me where the children are who were not accepted into the programs of these three schools because their attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), or Asperger's disorder or other issues were outside the narrow parameters of those delineated as acceptable for our Jewish schools. Tell me about all the children who are just now being assessed, who will have a very limited number of educational options open to them in the Jewish system. Tell me how long there will be programs at all in the schools, because they require a huge investment of time and services that does not contribute to the "bottom line." Tell me who mourns the loss of the possibilities that will never exist for these children. And tell me, convince me, that the Jewish institutions in control of their destinies have done right by these children.

I suppose that at present – until the next cycle of parents takes up arms against the system and pressures for more complete and encompassing services – what exists will have to do. But do not distort the truth about how the present situation came to be.

QJC's reaction to Israel boycott

Lame, limp, lax… some words that come to mind when I read the reaction of Adam Atlas, Quebec Jewish Congress president, to the Centrale des syndicates du Quebec (CSQ)'s resolution to boycott Israel ("QJC questions union's endorsement of Israel boycott," CJN, July 16). He expressed "disappointment." The enemy takes great pleasure in the CSQ's stance, calling it "courageous and historic." But the QJC? Merely disappointed. What more can you expect from an organization that is ashamed to call itself Canadian. Another shame.

A chance to sing

The Jewish Susan Boyles are prohibited from singing in front of men ("Where are the Jewish Susan Boyles," CJN, July 16). As a result, they whisper in synagogue, fearful of sticking out if they do have strong voices. Furthermore, we have religious girls' schools full of wonderful sopranos and mezzo-sopranos who have never sung in their upper registers, because they have never had female models.

There is more to Torah scholarship than the Talmud. The Jewish Susan Boyle must be given the chance to sing her song or prayer, full voice, heartfelt, somewhere.

Einstein and the Technion

The article "Einstein lives on – at Hebrew University" (CJN, July 9) stated that the president emeritus of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Hanoch Gutfreund, "said that Einstein's most prominent association with the Zionist movement was his commitment to Hebrew U… In 1923, he travelled to what was then Palestine… to deliver a lecture on Mount Scopus, which is now part of the Hebrew U campus."

For historical purposes, it is worth noting that on the same trip, Einstein "visited Haifa in February 1923… [and] agreed to head the committee [the German committee for the Hebrew Techniah in Haifa]. Thus Dr. Albert Einstein became the first chairman of the first Technion Society in the world." (From Technion – the Story of Israel's Institute of Technology by Carl Alpert.)

The Technion formally commenced classes in Haifa in 1924. After emigrating to the United States, Einstein campaigned to establish the American Technion Society. Einstein, who had retained his interest in the Technion ever since he had been chairman of Technion's first society of friends in Germany more than 20 years earlier, sent frequent messages of encouragement.

In 1944, in a letter to the American Technion Society, he wrote: "It gives me real satisfaction to know that I took part in the founding of the society… I want to stress again that the Technion, as the only technological training and research institute in Palestine, is indispensable for the development of industry and every kind of practical work in the country. Its importance for the rehabilitation of our people after the war is obvious."

Perspectives

Israel is no melting pot

By DONALD CARR

My wife, Judy, and I have just returned from our second visit this year to our small apartment in Jerusalem. I am again struck by the diversity of the inhabitants of this remarkable land.

No melting pot this – except perhaps in relation to the summer's incessant heat, which, as one ages, seems to take a greater toll on those of us from cooler climes. Indeed, for Canadians, Israel truly demonstrates "multiculturalism."

Shula Cohen

We had our "usual" lunch with Shula Cohen. Now in her mid-90s, Shula came with her family as a very young child to Jerusalem from Argentina. As a teenager she was "married off" to a wealthy man many years her senior who lived in Beirut, Lebanon. There she became friendly with the young daughter of the Lebanese president and was a frequent visitor to the presidential palace.

In late 1947, during a reception at the palace for some dignitary, she overheard two Lebanese generals discussing an impending invasion of what was soon to be Israel. Panic-stricken, for both her parents and siblings, as well as for the Jewish community, she found a way to secret a letter, written in "girl-guide" lemon-juice invisible ink, to the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem, relating what she had heard.

That letter was the genesis of a career for Shula as one of Israel's most important spies. Over several years during the 1950s, while bearing seven children, she transmitted important information, gleaned from her high contacts in Lebanon. Perhaps more importantly (on a direct human level), during that period, she single-handedly engineered the escape of countless Jews from Syria, Lebanon and Iraq, through Lebanon, into Israel. Her involvement included not just the planning, but the much more dangerous activity of actually leading the way, through Lebanon, to safety.

Captured, she spent seven years in a Syrian-administered Lebanese prison, where she was subjected to relentless torture. This included not just beatings which resulted in life-long scars, but the removal of all of her fingernails and toenails.

In 1967, along with a captured Israeli pilot, she was exchanged for hundreds of Lebanese and Syrian soldiers then in Israeli hands.

Widowed for many years, Shula now lives a quiet life alone, in a walk-up third-floor apartment in Jerusalem, with failing eyesight but a keen mind, which leads her to discuss, with great insight, whatever subjects one may care to raise with her.

Mordechai Limon

The first commander of Israel's navy, Mordechai Limon, recently died. His friend of many years, Israeli President Shimon Peres, spoke at his funeral. In addition to the serious comments about the deceased, the president related one or two lighter moments of his career. Among them was the occasion of a reception in London, given by the British military.

Several retired British generals, naval and air officers were invited. The story was told that when one of the older, retired generals, who was a little hard of hearing, was introduced to Admiral Limon, he asked "What country did you say you were from?" "Israel" was the response. "Never heard of it" said the general. The admiral said, "You probably remember it as 'Palestine,'" "Oh!" said the general. "Are those blasted Jews still giving you trouble?"

Shai Fredo

Sitting with us at a dinner, part of the annual conference of Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal, was Shai Fredo. Tall, extremely handsome, speaking English and Hebrew with ease, this young performer/actor had just returned from New York, where he had an engagement for a couple of weeks.

On being asked, he related how he had come to Israel.

His 92-year-old widowed grandfather, the patriarch of the family, had long wanted to make aliyah. Despite all obstacles, in 1982, he insisted that he, Shai's father and mother and their 12 children delay no longer. They set out on foot from their village in Ethiopia. They walked for months until they reached Sudan. There, they were obliged to stay in a refugee camp for more than a year, in miserable conditions. However, the ordeal was too much for his grandfather, and he died. It was a great blow to Shai, who had idolized his grandfather and realized that he had never realized his dream. After several more delays, along with so many other Ethiopian Jews, the bereft family finally arrived in Israel.

Shai is now a much sought-after, consummate actor-dancer, performing his one-man shows on television and on the stage. He is a living example of what the return to Zion means, regardless of place of birth, colour, language or ethnic tradition.

Prof. Yariv Ben-Eliezer

Recently we had the pleasure of meeting Prof. Yariv Ben-Eliezer, director of media studies at the prestigious Interdisciplinary Centre in Herzliya. The person who introduced him made a reference to the fact that Ben-Eliezer had run several election campaigns for Shimon Peres. However, Ben-Eliezer interrupted the introducer by saying loudly, "He didn't win any of them!"

We were in founding Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion's original Tel Aviv home, which has been maintained exactly as it was when he and his wife left for Sde Boker to spend his final years as a kibbutz member. A grandson of Ben-Gurion, Ben-Eliezer told delightful stories about growing up with that great man of history, his saba (grandfather).

When asked about the much-criticized nature of Israel's hasbara (foreign information service), he was very succinct.

He believes that it's futile to attempt to demonstrate to the world the many positive facets of Israel and how there are, for example, much-vaunted "shared values" with other democracies.

Rather, he believes that there should be direct approaches to various groupings in the rest of the world, contrasting clearly the difference between the treatment of those groups in Israel and in the Muslim Arab world.

"Ask the gays, how they would exist in a Muslim country".

"Tell those who demonstrate for women's rights what the role of women is in Arab countries."

"Ask those who trumpet what they believe to be human rights what they can expect from Hamas or the Palestinian Authority."

"Remind the blacks of North America about who brought their forbears to the slave ships from Africa and who still trade in human lives. It was and is the Arabs!"

A very forthright approach!

Zaki Shayou

In such a facility in Bat Yam, adjacent to Tel Aviv, there are many survivors of the Shoah. Unlike the majority of such survivors, these men and women lived in the former Soviet Union. They suffered not only the horrors of the Nazi invasion, but also harsh years under Communist rule. Their new home is modern, their apartments are furnished with updated fixtures and they enjoy structured activities to keep their minds and bodies active.

We joined a group of attendees of the World Conference of Keren Hayesod who visited the Bat Yam home, as part of a series of visits to see how charitable dollars are being spent.

As a welcome to the visitors, the residents' choir gave a short concert. The men wore tuxedos. The women showed off their gowns. One female member of the choir even had a beribboned, colourful, folk bonnet from her old area of Russia. All seemed to have trained voices. All had greying hair. Their performance of Russian and Yiddish folk songs, sung with such joy and concentration, brought tears to the eyes of audience members.

The director of the residence then introduced three residents.

First was the veteran battle-tried officer of the Red Army of World War II who had also been a professor. As his story was told, he stood stiffly to attention, his blazer festooned with shining medals, from top to bottom, a proud smile on his face.

Second was a striking lady, confined to a wheelchair. Her teenage story of escaping a locked building deliberately put to the fire by the Nazis, her activities with the Russian partisans, whom she then joined and her escapades in attacking German camps and installations, until the Red Army recovered lost Russian territory, sounded like the script for a Hollywood film. However, it was very real.

The director then called upon a third resident to tell his own story. Zaki, 67 years old, described his four years in a Syrian prison in Aleppo. Surviving unimaginable conditions, he was fiercely tortured in a variety of ways, almost daily. His crime? He was a Jew.

Ultimately a broken man, he was released. He was miraculously enabled to leave Syria and reach Israel. He raised his voice and with tearful eyes and reddened face he proclaimed that here – Eretz Yisrael – was the only place for a Jew to live!

I realized that my wife, Judy, sitting next to me, was not only listening attentively, but was quite agitated. "What year did Zaki leave prison and Syria?" "Nineteen-eighty." "What is Zaki's surname?" "Shayou." "Were you in prison with Mamroud?" Zaki's eyes widened as he nodded. "Do you know a 'Mrs. Judy'?" I asked. The eyes widened more. "This," I said, pointing to my wife, "is 'Mrs. Judy.'"

With tears streaming down his face, Zaki, leaped forward and embraced Judy in a gigantic bear hug, kissing her and crying "Todah! Todah! Todah! Mrs. Judy got me out!"

Judy, through her own tears, only exclaimed "I never knew what happened to you!"

The hall was pandemonium, as residents and guests alike stood up, applauded and cried. Dumbfounded, the director asked Judy to tell everyone what the fuss was all about, and she briefly described her secret rescue of the largest part of the Jewish population of Syria over many years.

As we later left the Bat Yam residence, Judy was presented with a Shabbat and Yom Tov challah cover and a matzah cover for Pesach, both having been made and meticulously embroidered by residents.

Only by Jews can these precious moments be lived, for only to Jews can these things happen.

The 18th Maccabiah Games and beyond

The inaugural Maccabiah Games took place in 1932 on the 1,800th anniversary of the Bar Kochba revolt. That uprising, which kept the ruling Roman legions at bay for almost three years and restored Jewish sovereignty to Judea for all of that period, is a seminal event in Jewish history. The Games themselves – their name derived from the Maccabees, who also revolted successfully, in their time against persecution by the Hellenist Seleucids – have come to reflect Jewish courage and strength. So, with the dual symbolism of a history of survival against seemingly insurmountable odds and the hallowed, often mystical, significance of "chai" (life) as the backdrop, the 18th rendition of the modern Maccabiah got under way in mid-July.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

That this sports festival is ongoing and always growing – this year hosting an estimated 7,000 athletes from 56 countries – is in itself a triumph. But it's questionable whether such growth can be sustained. Busing participants from accommodation centres to their sports venues creates special challenges in a country where traffic gridlock is the norm rather than the exception, while trying to find suitable housing for so many athletes seems to be an exercise in perpetual futility. This year, some of the junior athletes (and their parents) – Canadians included – were especially displeased about where their teams had to stay.

But beyond such logistical aggravations, it's the spiralling cost of the Games that most urgently requires attention. Unless the Maccabi World Union and its confederations around the world are able to both control their expenses and improve their fundraising, the viability of future Maccabiah Games may be at risk. What is clear, meanwhile, is that the financial burden on individual athletes has become untenable.

A clearer focus on what the Maccabiah is, and what it's not, is also needed. Though still referred to as the "Jewish Olympics," the reality is that very few world-class Jewish athletes remain attracted to the Games. Also, the quality of competition in some events has not come up to expectation. Consequently, rather than promoting itself as something it may not be, the Maccabi movement might get more mileage out of even more strongly promoting the centrality of Israel and facilitating the connectedness of young Jewish athletes to the Jewish state and its people – sentiments that are already at the core of its mission.

Merging the values of youth and sport and Jewish identity to more creatively define the Maccabi brand may turn out to be the formula that's needed to attract both athletes and funding for the next Maccabiah and those that come after it.

Haredi-secular gulf still wide in Jerusalem

Despite its image of insularity, recently a modicum of change has occurred in Jerusalem's haredi community. Haredim have generally solved their problems by looking inward, but some are beginning to recognize they need help from outside professionals. Cases of child abuse, family violence and pedophilia are now more frequently dealt with by the city's social services, police and courts and not only by the community's rabbis.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Many haredi women are joining the workforce after receiving vocational training and not subsisting solely on the handouts their husbands collect as yeshiva students. Haredi websites abound, catering to the community's needs, but also opening it to the outside world.

And until recently, almost all haredi young men took advantage of an exemption from military service based on the presumption they're engrossed in Torah study. It's a source of tremendous resentment toward haredim by the general Israeli public. Several years ago, the Defence Ministry, the army and some rabbis came together to form a new military unit that allows young haredi men who've left Torah study to enlist without compromising their religious way of life. No women serve in this unit and its soldiers get glatt kosher food. The initial pilot project was deemed a success, and the unit was recently upgraded to a full-fledged battalion, named Netzer Yehuda, tasked with containing terrorism and unrest in the Jenin district of the West Bank. One-third of its soldiers are haredi, and some 2,500 men have joined its ranks.

Despite these positive signs, some things never change. Nary a year goes by without often-violent protests by haredim. Pretexts have included the possibility of finding ancient Jewish graves in planned road extensions, Shabbat traffic on roads adjacent to haredi neighbourhoods, a store selling chametz on Pesach and the gay pride parade.

In June, Jerusalem's newly elected secular mayor's decision to open a municipal parking lot situated near the Old City, and not far from Mea Shearim, on Saturdays sparked protests. The move addressed the genuine need of thousands of tourists and Israelis who flock to the city every Shabbat.

More recently, rioting ensued after police, acting on information from doctors at Hadassah Medical Center, detained a pregnant haredi mother of four suspected of having starved one of her children, a three-year-old, who's now in serious condition at Hadassah. The mother, who refused to co-operate with police, apparently suffers from "Munchausen's syndrome by proxy" a psychiatric disorder that causes sufferers to abuse others, usually children, to draw attention or sympathy to themselves.

In both cases, the haredim responded violently. Men lay before vehicles entering the parking lot. Stones and dirtied diapers were thrown at passing vehicles. Intersections were blocked. Police officers were called Nazis. They and municipal employees were attacked. Doctors and social workers were harassed and threatened. Traffic lights were destroyed and hundreds of communal garbage bins were torched.

The police officer in charge of the haredi mother's investigation likened the actions of some of her associates to those of underworld criminal gangs. His comments echoed apprehensions that not enough is being done to enforce the rule of law among haredim.

According to the Jerusalem Institute of Israel Studies (JIIS), at the end of 2007, there were 150,000 haredim living in Jerusalem, comprising 30 per cent of its Jews. Ever-growing, the haredi community makes continued inroads into previously non-haredi neighbourhoods, changing the city's demographics. If it weren't for young haredim moving to places such as Betar Illit and Modiin Illit (both just over the Green Line in the West Bank) or Ramat Bet Shemesh in search of cheaper housing, their numbers in Jerusalem would be more dramatic. And if U.S. President Barack Obama gets his way and building in all Israeli West Bank settlements is frozen, that drama might yet unfold. JIIS projects that without internal migration, by 2020, 41 per cent of Jerusalem's Jews will be haredim.

So is there a future for a pluralistic Jerusalem? I can't say for certain, but as long as enough like-minded people are willing to actively strive for it, there's hope. That endeavour can be multi-faceted and include counter-demonstrations, solid educational institutions, industry and a vibrant cultural milieu.

During the latest spate of haredi rioting, thousands enjoyed 10 fabulous days of cinema at the 26th Jerusalem International Film Festival. It was our expression of what this city is also about.

York U and HRW: naming and shaming

Is the political war to demonize Israel losing ground? Are some of the organizations and participants, particularly Jewish academics, starting to understand that they were wrong or exploited?

It's far too early to celebrate a return to sanity, but the exposure of Human Rights Watch's (HRW) illicit romance with Saudi Arabia and the widespread ridicule of York University's recent anti-Israel conference do suggest that some cleansing and moral restoration has begun.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

HRW, which has an office and donors in Toronto, has led in the exploitation of human rights to attack Israel for the past decade. The organization was founded as Helsinki Watch in the late 1970s by Robert Bernstein in order to campaign for the release of prisoners of conscience, particularly Soviet Jews. But in the early 1990s, with the collapse of the Soviet empire, the group and its leaders lost their moral compass.

To keep the money flowing and maintain political influence and ready access to the media, HRW's leaders found another mission as the arbiters (along with London-based Amnesty International) of international law in different contexts, including military invasions, guerrilla wars and ethno-national conflicts.

And few have noticed that these organizations had no professional expertise to deal with complex issues. The judgments of HRW and Amnesty have been accepted at face value, including by the CBC. (On the July 1 edition of CBC Radio's As it Happens, an HRW official received seven minutes to indict Israel for "war crimes" in Gaza. Interviewer Barbara Budd didn't question Marc Garlasco's limited credentials or his bias. Reuters news agency, to its credit, exposed the contradictions and pseudo-technical analysis.)

For HRW, Israel-bashing has been very profitable – budgets have grown and officials are welcomed in United Nations human rights organizations chaired by Iran and Libya. Their constant anti-Israel condemnations, dressed up as "research reports," provide automatic media access and prestige.

But like other power brokers, HRW officials became arrogant and have now been caught in a corruption scandal, following a fundraising dinner in Saudi Arabia in which the main dish was HRW's record of Israel-bashing. (Its Jewish executive director, Ken Roth, did not participate, and Sarah Leah Whitson, director of HRW's Middle East and North Africa division, has not revealed whether she wore a veil or was allowed to drive while in the country.) This escapade highlighted HRW's moral failure, leading to a closer examination of its history of bias and methodological manipulation. In response, HRW officials covered up the facts, claiming that they met with private Saudi citizens who were interested in human rights in their own country, and were not focused on Israel. But uncomfortable donors weren't buying this, and one of the guests was revealed to be a member of the Shura council. The probe grew to include all of HRW's Middle East activities, and the group is likely to undergo a total reorganization and change in officials, particularly for the Middle East, in order to regain its lost moral credibility.

Similarly, York University's "one state" conference, which took place at the end of June, led to the exposure of this gross abuse of the academic framework to promote hard-core Israel-bashing. In this case as well, the language of human rights was abused, and like HRW, those responsible tried to cover up the evidence, digging themselves in deeper. Detailed academic reports (in contrast to the emotional and counterproductive denunciations by some opponents) put faculty organizers and university administrators on the defensive.

Prof. Naama Carmi, a conference participant from Haifa University, wrote a sharp critique in the Toronto Star, and she expanded it in her blog, condemning the "ostensibly academic conference" in which she said Jews were "silenced and marginalized." (Prof. Carmi is on the left of the political spectrum and was once active in a number of Israeli groups claiming to promote human rights.) Like HRW, York's credibility will only recover when the officials responsible for this fiasco are no longer in positions to do further damage.

These are only two examples out of dozens, but they're important. Both show that carefully considered strategies exposing the false rhetoric of peace and human rights can unmask those responsible for these abuses in powerful institutions.

The Kirshner File

Felix Mendelssohn spoke to and from the heart

Felix Mendelssohn lifts the spirit and sends it soaring.

Mendelssohn's more than 700 compositions – symphonies, concertos, chamber music, violin and piano pieces, oratorios and songs – endure and inspire. The Italian Symphony, the Reformation, A Midsummer Night's Dream, the Violin Concerto in E minor, the Wedding March and Songs without Words, among others, will doubtless delight audiences for centuries to come and solidify Mendelssohn's reputation as one of the finest composers of the Romantic era.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Influenced by Mozart, Bach and Beethoven, Mendelssohn carved out a niche not only as a composer but also as a pianist and conductor, a feat few of his peers could match.

Mendelssohn was born in the German city of Hamburg 200 years ago this year, and his jubilee will be marked by a festival in Leipzig from Aug. 21 to Sept. 9.

Leipzig, in eastern Germany, was where he died on Nov. 4, 1847, and where a museum, the only one of its kind in the world, commemorates his extraordinary life.

Mendelssohn Haus, at 12 Goldschmidstrasse, has been preserved as his last private residence. He and his family lived here from 1845 until his untimely death at the shockingly young age of 38. Last year, 30,000 tourists, mainly Germans but also Japanese and Israelis, visited the museum.

Close to the Gewandhaus concert hall, of which he was director of music, the museum is housed in a renovated 19th-century building with creaking hardwood floors and pale green walls in which the artifacts of his career are permanently displayed.

As you wander through the building, which was built in 1843, refurbished in the 1870s and magically transformed into a museum 12 years ago, the precious objects associated with Mendelssohn come into view: the original furniture, including an upholstered sofa and matching five chairs. The grand piano, manufactured in Vienna around 1830, on which he practised. The original sheets of music he perused. A lock of his hair under glass. Portraits of Mendelssohn. Skilful watercolours of idyllic Swiss scenery painted by Mendelssohn himself on the cusp of death.

The composer – the son of a Jewish banker and the grandson of the eminent Enlightenment philosopher Moses Mendelssohn – moved into this house, designed in the style of late classicism, in August 1845, accompanied by his French wife, Cecile Jeanrenaud, and their four children, Karl, Marie, Paul and Felix.

Mendelssohn's friend and fellow musician, Louis Spohr, was impressed by their first-storey flat: "Its furnishings and overall impression creates an atmosphere of luxury and wealth, but also of... very charming unpretentiousness."

A portrait of Felix Mendelssohn in Mendelessohn Haus [Sheldon Kirshner photos]

After Mendelssohn passed away, apparently heartbroken by the death of his sister and soulmate, Fanny, his wife left 12 Goldschmidstrasse, her children in tow, and the building was coverted into a paint factory. In 1867, a sheet music publisher rented the first floor, and a decade later, a merchant bought the building.

In 1991, a year after Germany was reunified and the Communist regime in the eastern part of the country fell, Kurt Masur, the 11th music director of the Gewandhaus, founded an association to perpetuate Mendelssohn's legacy.

By then, Mendelssohn's stock had been in eclipse for decades, undermined by changing musical tastes and anti-Semitism.

Mendelssohn and his three siblings were baptized as Christians in 1816 after their father, Abraham, renounced Judaism and assumed the surname of Bartholdy.

Like Heinrich Heine, the great German-Jewish poet, Mendelssohn's father believed that Christianity would be his family's "admission ticket" to European culture.

A child protégé, Mendelssohn debuted as a pianist in 1818 and composed his first work in 1820. At 15, he wrote his first symphony for full orchestra. In 1829, he arranged and conducted a performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's St. Matthew Passion, the first one since his death in 1750, and thus played an integral role in reviving his music.

After visiting Britain, which inspired the Scottish Symphony and the Hebrides Overture, he was appointed director of music at the Gewandhaus, which is currently led by Riccardo Chailly.

Jurgen Ernst, the director of Mendelssohn Haus

Two years later, in 1837, he got married. His wife was the daughter of a Huguenot pastor.

Mendelssohn, having served as Kapellmeister in Prussia's royal court, founded the Leipzig Conservatory in 1843, the first such institution in the German lands.

Leipzig, in the 19th century, was a city of rare musical accomplishment. Bach and Robert Schumann resided here and Richard Wagner was born here. Leipzig was also the home of the famous St. Thomas Boys Choir.

Eight months after conducting his last concert at the Gewandhaus and resigning from his position at the conservatory, he died. His funeral took place in Leipzig. He was buried in the Trinity Cemetery in Berlin.

Mendelssohn's jealous rival, Wagner, who frequently accused Jews of being a harmful and foreign element in German society, published a scurrilous pamphlet, Jewishness in Music, after his death.

Foreshadowing Nazi propaganda, he claimed that Jewish composers were only capable of producing shallow and artificial works because they had no real connection to genuine German culture.

By no coincidence, Adolf Hitler was Wagner's admirer. During the Nazi era, Mendelssohn's compositions were banished from the public domain and his statue in front of the Gewandhaus was demolished, prompting the resignation of Leipzig's mayor.

Some of Mendelssohn's descendants, all Christians, were compelled to leave Germany as Nazi anti-Semitism intensified.

Still others, like the Prussian aristocrat Jurgen von Schwerin, whose maternal grandfather was a Mendelssohn Bartholdy, were permitted to remain in Germany. Today, the descendants of Felix and his brother, Paul, supposedly live in Berlin under different names.

Jurgen Ernst, the director of Mendelssohn Haus, explained that the decline of Mendelssohn's reputation in Germany was due not only to Wagner's malicious anti-Semitic broadside.

As he put it, "At the end of the 19th century, Romanticism went out of style. Schumann was affected by this development, too. Yet Mendelssohn was not forgotten, especially in Britain."

The Mendelssohn renaissance was spearheaded by Masur, who felt that he had been unjustly relegated to the shadows. He created the Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy Foundation to save his last residence in Leipzig from further decay and raise funds for a thorough renovation. Ernst, a 54-year-old engineer and stage craftsman who has worked for the Leipzig Opera, was hired as a fundraiser. He convinced private donors, as well as municipal, state and federal governments, to contribute to the project. Extensive renovations were undertaken. Mendelssohn Haus, with its modest gardens shaded by chestnut trees, was officially inaugurated in 1997, on the 150th anniversary of his death.

Apart from Mendelssohn Haus, the Mendelssohn Project, based in the United States, also fosters appreciation for this immensely gifted and influential figure.

"Mendelssohn was a genius and a perfect stylist," said Ernst. "He was a master of harmony and melody. He spoke to and from the heart."

Young artists featured in fundraiser for Zareinu

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

To celebrate their philosophy that all children are valuable members of the community, two non-profit groups of young people recently organized a fundraiser of collaborative art, music, spoken word and visual experiences, in support of the Zareinu Educational Centre.

The Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) and the Birthright Israel Alumni Community (BAC) held the Revelations Art Show July 12 at the Lonsdale Gallery in Toronto, showcasing the work of nine young Jewish artists who were eager to support Zareinu, a Jewish day school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental challenges.

The idea for Revelations came from Lindsay Malet, a JUMP and Birthright participant who has a passion for the arts. Malet took the initiative to create the event last year to raise funds and awareness for Save a Child's Heart, a non-profit humanitarian project that strives to improve the quality of pediatric cardiac care for children from developing countries who suffer from heart disease.

"Last year's show involved a silent auction to raise money for the organization," Malet said. "This year, we chose a new recipient and changed the theme. We've gotten a lot more public attention and really feel that we've started a good trend."

Shoshana Allen, JUMP's program and marketing manager, said the first art show was such a success that they did not want to limit their fundraising to just one charity.

"All the proceeds from this year's show will be going to UJA [Federation of Greater Toronto] in direct support of Zareinu... an incredible cause that also represents the future of our community. We know the capacity of this demographic, and JUMP and BAC aim to continually expose [people] to organizations that need their support," she said.

"Although JUMP and BAC are both non-profits, our goal is to inspire our demographic and help them understand the Jewish idea of tikkun olam. To see people enjoying themselves, meeting other young professionals and supporting a cause is a really exciting environment to be in."

Allen said while Revelations is a display of young talent, it is also an expression of common interest in giving back to the Jewish community. Since this year's show was built from the momentum of last year's event, JUMP had many more artist applicants to consider before selecting the nine they featured. In the end, Allen said JUMP and BAC were thrilled with their decisions.

"They are all so incredibly talented in their own right. You can see their passion for their work in their pieces and that they are all on the verge of something huge. It's a great feeling to be in a room with that energy. It represents all of us at JUMP and BAC – passionate and on the verge of something much bigger than the events we put on."

Dina Taub, whose acrylic paintings examine energy in nature, was one of the artists whose works were displayed at the show. She has attended many JUMP events and volunteered at Zareinu, which made her an obvious candidate.

"I feel very special, privileged and honoured to be part of Revelations," Taub said. "Many artists in their 20s and 30s have felt isolated in this city, and this show meets a need in exposing our talents and abilities."

Melanie Cheskes, an artist who has painted in Toronto and Jerusalem, said she enjoys exploring the connection between Jewish youth and Israel. She said her pieces are usually political, and those seen at the show portrayed friends who served in the Israeli army and now find peace and solace in the country's natural springs.

"It's important to support younger, emerging artists," Cheskes said. "Revelations has made it easy for us to showcase our work in a great gallery for a great cause."

Other artists included Clare Nisker, who travelled to exotic destinations to gain perspective for her pieces; Calvin Benchimol, a photographer who captured Israel's beauty through his lens; Jeanne Louise Gordon, whose brightly coloured abstract paintings lit up the room; Karen Schmerler, whose Unconditional, a painting of a mother and child embracing, touched many; Dara Alter, whose painting of the Western Wall was spiritually uplifting; Yoav Kogan, who exhibited his red and black series of painted hands; and Dalia Heymann, a former industrial design student who transformed old chairs into functional and innovative objects.

Perhaps the most powerful art at the show, however, was in spoken word format – an excerpt read by Sara Farb from a play she wrote about her sister, Rebecca. Farb's piece could not have been more appropriate, as Rebecca was once a student at Zareinu.

Correction

A reference to the Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation (CIIRDF) in the story "Cdn. astronaut visits Ramon's family" (CJN, July 2) suggested that the foundation was formed in 2004. In fact, the CIIRDF was established by bilateral agreement of the governments of Canada and Israel in 1994 to promote collaborative R&D between firms in the two countries.

Young Jews flee Venezuela for Canada

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If you'd asked Jonathan and Adriana Rosemberg five years ago whether they'd be seeking refuge in Toronto, the Venezuelan couple would have responded incredulously.

Yet that's exactly what they're doing now, having fled Caracas for Toronto last month to escape what they say is a growing surge of unbearable anti-Semitism in their homeland.

Caracas, the capital, is home to the majority of Venezuela's Jews.

"Anti-Semitism has become socially acceptable in Venezuela now. It's a normal occurrence," Jonathan, 30, told The CJN in a recent interview at the couple's hastily rented apartment in Toronto.

"In Venezuela, [Jews] live in homes that are prisons with fences. You carry guns everywhere. We didn't want to live like that anymore," he said.

Both have left family and friends behind, and hope they can convince their relatives to escape what they describe as a "very unsafe situation for Jews" under Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's radical, socialist regime.

According to world Jewish population counts compiled by the American Jewish Committee, the Venezuelan Jewish community numbered slightly more than 15,000 in 2006.

It's likely that number has dropped dramatically since that time, the Rosembergs believe.

"At least 80 per cent of my Jewish friends and family have left Venezuela," Jonathan said. "Chavez has created [a society] that lives in ignorance and fear. Now you hear anti-Semitism on [national] radio. They are officially [quoting] from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion as 'facts' about Jews. 'Zionist' is a word you can barely use in Venezuela anymore."

It's a situation that is eerily reminiscent of German Jewry's reaction to the rise of Nazism, the Rosembergs said, referring to how many Jews chose to flee Germany in the years preceding the Holocaust.

Additionally, according to popular rumour spreading throughout Venezuela, Chavez is flirting with conversion to Islam, the Rosembergs said.

In recent years, Chavez has befriended Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, praised Hezbollah during the 2006 Israel-Lebanon War and has pledged monetary support for Iran's nascent nuclear program.

It's now widely believed that Hezbollah – the Iranian-backed terrorist organization – has established a base of operations in Venezuela.

"There's now a direct flight between Tehran and Caracas," Jonathan said.

Citing a rash of attacks on synagogues and Jewish establishments over the last few years, the Rosembergs accused the Venezuelan government of complicity in these events, and of using them to obtain and build a registry of Jews for their own nefarious reasons.

"I had a lot of friends back home who aren't Jewish, and [now] they reject you due to stereotyping," Adriana said, with Jonathan translating from Spanish.

The couple came to Canada on student visas, but hope to settle here permanently.

Adriana, 27, a Spanish-language communications specialist by profession, is enrolled at the University of Toronto in English language courses in order to facilitate a career, if she is able to remain in the country.

For his part, Jonathan is fluent in English, having obtained a bachelor's degree in political science from McGill University during a four-year stay in Montreal. He's starting this fall at the George Brown College Chef School.

Though he comes from a well-established family – the Rosembergs have lived in Venezuela since the early 1950s, he said – Jonathan said Chavez encourages the populace to scorn the rich, particularly wealthy Jews.

"Chavez is giving people permission to be violent," he said, noting that things became so bad for him at one point, he could only leave his home accompanied by bodyguards to feel any semblance of safety, something that would have been unthinkable to him just a few years ago.

Last year, while living in an apartment complex in Caracas, Adriana and Jonathan said they were also subjected to frequent anti-Semitic graffiti on their building, such as "Jews go home" and "Zionist=Nazi."

Being proud Jews and politically active, the Rosembergs said they often participated in rallies back home against Chavez's policies, braving rubber bullets and tear gas from Venezuelan police.

"Venezuela is a beautiful country, don't get me wrong. Up until a few years ago, the people were the nicest. Then, everything changed," Jonathan said.

The Rosembergs also allege that Venezuela's Jewish lay leadership has not been helpful to the country's community, as they've opted for a more appeasing approach to dealing with Chavez and anti-Semitic activity.

In May, Jewish members of the U.S. Congress opposed a resolution expressing solidarity with the Jewish community in Venezuela at the behest of the Confederation of Israelite Associations of Venezuela (CAIV), the country's main umbrella group of Jewish organizations.

In a phone interview with JTA at the time, Fred Pressner, a past president of CAIV, emphasized that the biggest problem with the resolution was its "bad timing."

"All of our institutions are protected by the police – we cannot complain about that," Pressner said, noting that "the government reacted well" to the earlier attacks. He added that the Jewish community had recently had some "informal communications with some top level officials of the government."

However, allegations of the Chavez regime's anti-Semitism won't go away.

Among other anti-Semitic influences, the U.S. Anti-Defamation League cites Norberto Ceresole, an Argentine political scientist and Holocaust denier, as one of Chavez's ideological mentors. Ceresole wrote a book titled Caudillo, Ejercito, Pueblo (Leader, Army, People) about the Chavez revolution. Its introductory chapter is titled, "The Jewish question and the State of Israel."

"There's no question Chavez will continue to harass the Jewish community," Jonathan said.

A PERSONAL INVITATION FROM GIL BLUTRICH
TO TORONTO'S JEWISH COMMUNITY
Seven years ago, I found one of Ontario's undiscovered jewels. With six and a half miles of shoreline across from the 30,000 Islands, Port McNicoll includes a mile-long boat slip that would cost hundreds of millions of dollars to build today. And, best of all, it's just 70 minutes from Toronto up Hwy #400.
I would like to invite you to explore the new Port McNicoll Discovery Centre and be introduced to the new master plan for our $1 billion resort village, including a planned community centre, yacht club, hotels, commercial village centre and aqua centre. Port McNicoll will be the waterfront complement to our ski and golf destination, Horseshoe Resort, just a short drive away.
Please join us for a private tour this weekend.
RSVP to Phyllis Shapiro: 647 281 5144
Please visit soon, as only a few deep waterfront and waterview lots remaining in Phase 1 from just $248,990* including a boat slip/dock* and 75' of water rights.

Blind golfer raises awareness for Beit Halochem

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At 57, Zohar Sharon claims to have lost some of the zeal and competitive fire that characterized his earlier years in golf – sort of.

The father of a one-year-old boy, he says his interest in the sport is not what it once was, and he plans to spend more time with his son and grandchild (with another on the way) by cutting back on his time roaming the globe to play in tournaments and exhibitions.

But when asked whether that means he's ready to relinquish his title as world's best blind golfer, he responds quickly: "Never."

"He will be Number 1 until he retires," Sharon said through an interpreter.

By virtue of dominating the International Blind Golf Championships – he won the title in Northern Ireland last year by six strokes – Sharon can lay claim to the designation of best blind golfer in the world.

Truth be told, he's not bad playing against sighted golfers. When he's on his game, he shoots around 80. When his back is acting up, or if conditions are windy or his right-hand man and caddy, Shimshon Levy, is off his game, his score shoots up to 100 or more.

Zohar was in Toronto recently as a guest of Beit Halochem Canada, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, the volunteer-backed organization that supports a variety of rehabilitation and cultural services to soldiers who have been injured in the service of their country.

During his one-week sojourn in Toronto, he was the main draw at a fundraising tournament at Angus Glen Golf Club, site of the 2007 Canadian Open.

The golf day at Angus Glen has become a regular event on the Beit Halochem Canada's calendar, said Lisa Levy, the organization's executive director.

This year, 124 people participated, with an estimated $60,000 raised for rehabilitation equipment.

"Zohar is an important part of raising awareness of how people with disabilities can participate in regular activities, rehabilitate and move on," she said.

Accompanied by his constant companion, Levy, and his seeing-eye dog, Sharon demonstrates golf skills that sighted players can only dream of.

Four years ago, while playing a round at Maple Downs, he stunned observers, including this reporter, by scoring a two under par eagle on the 387-yard par-4 third hole.

Incredibly, he's done even better than a "2" on his scorecard. Sharon has five holes-in-one to his credit, including two at tournaments in Boca Raton, Fla., and Palm Springs, Calif., and three at his home course in Caesarea.

Two of those aces were shot in the same game, he said.

Sharon wouldn't be able to succeed as he has without Levy, who tees up Sharon's balls, describes the hole, provides yardage, grounds his club behind the ball and provides all the other information that sighted golfers take in at a glance.

Sharon's golfing career takes him around the world – often to support Beit Halochem and childrens' charities back home in Israel. He figures he's on the road about one week a month. "I could do more, but I'd rather be home," he said.

Still, he practises daily and plays often, although never on Shabbat or Jewish holidays. He makes a point of wearing a kippah at tournaments.

So how did he manage to capture the blind golfers' championship when most tournaments are played on weekends? To accommodate him, they didn't play on Saturday, Sharon explained.

Golf has been very very good to Sharon, but his interests don't stop there. Before being blinded, Sharon was an art teacher and worked in sculpture. Though blind, he still creates works of art.

Sharon also works as a physiotherapist and masseur, and he's studied Chinese medicine.

He is, clearly, somewhat driven.

His interpreter, himself an army veteran who was badly injured in the 2006 Lebanon war, explained it this way:

"You get hungry when you're near death."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

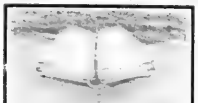
The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The month of Menachem Av

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN



Rabbinic Reflections

The word Av means "father." One asks: Why is the month in which both temples were destroyed and our people exiled called Av, or father?

The resolution of this question, however, introduces a unique Jewish approach to tragedy and misfortune. Often, we are overwhelmed by the extent of the suffering undergone by our people as a whole, and by certain individuals in particular. We ask – sometimes with anger and frustration – how could God do this?

Generally, two types of answers are offered:

• God stands aside, above involvement. He has left the world to the natural order and the tragedies were brought about by man on his own.

On one hand, this argument takes God off the hook, as it were. On the other hand, it means that we are left with an existential reality in which man must cope on his own.

• We rationalize God's judgment. We cannot judge as God judges. With our present, limited knowledge, there's no way that we can understand why tragedies take place, but when we see a bigger picture, look at previous incarnations, the standing of the entire Jewish nation at present and within history, we can comprehend the reason for the tragedies He has wrought.

However, one may not sit comfortably with this explanation. Firstly, since God is the ultimate of good, everything that He does must be good. He does not have to balance good with bad. Instead, He should be the source of unmitigated good, good that is overtly apparent as good.

Moreover, sometimes, the suffering is just so great that there is no way that we could accept any explanation for it.

In this instance, however, the question is itself the answer. There are tragedies that we cannot understand. As mortals, we don't have to understand God, yet we can trust Him. Indeed, as Maimonides says, to understand God, one has to be God.

Everything, even the fluttering of a leaf in the wind, is controlled by Divine providence. Certainly, this applies to man's – both individual and collective – fate. God is the ultimate of good and generosity. It is a most satisfying realization to appreciate that ultimately, everything that happens is in His hands. Whether or not we understand it, we can feel secure that He is the One determining our future.

This realization is also the key to transforming any Divine influence that appears to us as negative. When a father shows anger and his child looks at him lovingly in faith, the father's heart melts and he cannot persist in his rage. When we appreciate that everything that happens to us is from God and we look up to Him with love, all factors that are apparently negative will be temporary.

This is the allusion in calling this month Av – the Father: to know that everything is coming from Him.

Our rabbis add a further point, referring to the month as Menachem Av. Menachem means "comfort." The name is interpreted as indicating that God will comfort His people with the redemption, as the Haftorah read on the Shabbat following Tisha b'Av declares: "Take comfort, take comfort, My people… for she has received double for all her sins." Indeed the Talmud Sanhedrin says one of the names of the Mashiach will be Menachem. More literally, Menachem Av can be interpreted as meaning: "Comforting the Father."

God, too, is aggrieved over the exile. Our Sages quote Him as saying: "Woe is the Father whose children are exiled from His table." By doing what we can to hasten the redemption, we alleviate His grief and bring Him comfort.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is the spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel and Young Israel of Val Royal in Montreal.

Two giants in Jewish education

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

The world of Jewish education is much the poorer today for the loss of two men who, though very different in many ways, were united in their philosophy of caring for each child.

Until his untimely demise in November 2008 at the age of 52, Dr. Aryeh Geiger was the founder and principal of Reut school in Jerusalem, a pluralist religious school with a unique educational outlook. And the death of Rabbi Joseph Kelman in Toronto last month marks the passing of a remarkable figure who started the She'arim school for learning disabled children in Toronto and was involved in countless projects benefiting the Jewish community.

For Geiger, the assassination of Yitzchak Rabin in 1995 meant that religious education could no longer take a "business as usual" approach and needed a massive revision on many areas. Reut was founded in 1999 as a religious, pluralistic community with an emphasis not just on Jewish texts, but on social activism and helping the community at large. At Reut, students are empowered to take responsibility for their school by having a hand in decisions that actually matter in terms of student discipline and involvement.

I had the privilege of meeting Geiger at his school in late 2007, when his illness was already very advanced. He noted that Reut embodied many of the educational principles fashioned by Janusz Korczak, the director of a Jewish orphanage in Warsaw who was later murdered by the Nazis.

Korczak wanted education to be based on the idea that children are the breeding ground for the future of society. From an early age, the children were invited to set up codes of conduct for themselves, as well as a court of peers and a children's parliament, and to assess punishments for their own misbehaviour. For Korczak, a school community was not simply a group of children, but citizens in the making.

A few hours spent in the hallways of Reut would quickly convey the same message. Geiger treated children as rational agents who needed to take part in matters that, after all, concerned them, such as their education. Each child mattered.

In contrast with but a single encounter with Geiger, I had the great good fortune of speaking with Rabbi Kelman many times, and I had the chance to admire his enormous good works from a closer vantage point. The indefatigable nature of his quest to make sure that no child was left behind meant that he was able to press forward on projects that a lesser person would have long abandoned as doomed to failure.

Rabbi Kelman brings to mind Bernard Shaw's adage that "the reasonable man adapts himself to the world; the unreasonable man persists in trying to adapt the world to himself. Therefore, all progress depends on the unreasonable man." Rabbi Kelman's version of "unreasonableness," his refusal to say "no" when it meant helping others, changed the world.

In eulogizing Geiger, the MK Rabbi Michael Melchior noted that the patriarch Isaac continued to dig wells even though the Philistines kept filling them up, until he finally dug one that flowed without interruption. That is the mark of greatness that defined both Geiger and Rabbi Kelman. May their memory be for a blessing.

Jewish Life

In search of the sacred

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

In eastern Europe about 2-1/2 centuries ago, whenever the founder of the chassidic movement faced a difficult task, he would go to a certain place in the woods, light a fire and meditate in prayer – and the task he set out to perform was done. When, a generation later, the Sage of Meseritz was faced with a similar task, he would go to the same place in the woods and say: "We can no longer light the fire, but we can still speak the prayers" – and what he wanted done became reality.

A generation later, Rabbi Moshe Leib of Sassov had to perform the same task. He, too, went into the woods and said: "We can no longer light a fire, nor do we know the secret meditations belonging to the prayer, but we do know the place in the woods to which it all belongs." But when another generation had passed, the master scholar of Rishin remained at home and explained: "We cannot light a fire, we cannot speak the prayers and we do not know the place. All that remains is to tell the story of how it was once done."

This provocative anecdote describes the decline or deflection of the sacred from generation to generation. Perhaps this is inevitable as attitudes differ and conditions change.

Albert Einstein said this about the sacred: "The most beautiful experience we can have is the mysterious. It is the fundamental emotion which stands at the cradle of true art and true science. Whoever does not know it and can no longer wonder, no longer marvel, is as good as dead and his eyes are dimmed."

Indeed, the life of the universe is bound together by the ecology of the sacred. The awe and splendour of existence is a reflection of the spiritual.

William Blake wrote that to some people, a tree in bloom is something so incredibly beautiful that it brings tears to the eyes. But to others, it's just a green encumbrance that stands in the way. Blake, the mystic, strove "to see a world in a grain of sand./ And a heaven in a wild flower./ Hold infinity in the palm of your hand./ And eternity in an hour."

Helen Keller spoke of "dreary souls who have the sunset, the morning skies, the purple of distant hills, yet their souls voyage through this enchanted world with nothing but a barren stare."

In a similar vein, Elizabeth Barrett Browning lamented, "Earth's crammed with heaven./ And every common bush afire with God./ And only he who sees takes off his shoes/ The rest sit round it and pluck blackberries."

The marvelous machinery of the human body is an unending and amazing source of wonder. Its sophisticated structure is revealed in the fact that the complex pattern of every individual's entire genetic structure is to be found in the tiniest cell. It was this miraculous function of the body that undoubtedly caused David, the ancient sweet singer of Israel, to declare in the Psalms, "I praise you for I am awesomely and wondrously made; your work is wonderful; I know it very well."

When, in the Bible, God commands the children of Israel to be holy, God quickly indicates how this is to be achieved. "When you reap the harvest of your land you shall not reap all the way to the edges of the field… you shall leave them for the poor and stranger." "The wages of a labourer shall not remain with you until morning." "You shall not insult the deaf or place a stumbling block before the blind." "Do not favour the poor or show deference to the rich; judge fairly." "Love your neighbour as yourself." "The stranger who resides with you shall be to you as one of your citizens." "You shall have an honest measure and honest weights".

If trees barked like dogs and flowers hooted like owls, their grace and elegance would be noticed by multitudes who now pass by unseeing. Perhaps a greater poverty than that caused by lack of money is the poverty of unawareness.

Questions for our time: How do we achieve a reasoned life stance that's strong enough to face the challenges, contradictions and absurdities of our technological age? Can we continue to find meaning and purpose in the sacred, in those spiritual truths that are the products of centuries of years and oceans of tears?

Israel and cyberwar, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Anyone armed with a keyboard, an Internet connection and knowledge of the web can be a participant in the Mideast conflict. For most people that means using legitimate websites, petitions and discussion areas to try to sway public opinion. Others are using sophisticated techniques to hack into computers, deface websites and disrupt the flow of data.

Wired.com wrote about a group of Israeli students who developed a program to overload pro-Hamas websites. The Help Israel Win collective formed in late December as the conflict in Gaza heated up. "We couldn't join the real combat, so we decided to fight Hamas in the cyber arena," said "Liri," one the group's organizers. The group claims to have shut down sarayaalquds.org and qudsvoice.net. Ironically, the Help Israel Win website is no longer at its original address, since it "has had to shift from website to website, as they come under attack from unknown assailants." [tinyurl.com/webwar01]

Last year, visitors to the Bank of Israel website noticed something was amiss when a hacker left a message saying, "As an anti-colonial Muslim, I fully support the armed resistance of the Palestinians, Iraqis and Lebanese against the U.S. and Israel. I am serious about the liberation! By any means rendered necessary!" [tinyurl.com/webwar02]

While most Internet skullduggery is hush-hush, such is not always the case. Last year, the Los Angeles Times reported that the Tehran office of Hamas announced it was offering the equivalent of about $2,000 to anyone who hacks into a "Zionist" website. Contest organizers described the competition as a "peaceful and non-violent initiative." I did not find any word on whether the winnings have been claimed. [tinyurl.com/webwar 03]

Another ongoing battle involves online petitions. Several Internet sites like ipetitions.com and petitionspot.com have sprung up. At PetitionSite.com, more than 17,000 people want to "Suspend EU-Israel Association Agreement." [tinyurl.com/ webwar04] Alternatively, there is also a petition calling for "Fair Play for Israel at the United Nations," with 2,974 signatures. [tinyurl.com/webwar05]

By the way, not all online petitions about Israel are quite as political as the ones mentioned above. A search also turned up a petition to "Stop the Huge Expansion of Horse Racing in Israel!" [tinyurl.com/webwar07] and another to persuade the English alternative rock group, Radiohead, to perform in Israel. [tinyurl.com/webwar08]

Other online conflicts attempt to exploit the power of search engines and cause people to click on their links. Let's say you want to find information about "Palestine." Type that word into Google and the first results you are presented (after the Wikipedia entries) are from PalestineHistory.com and PalestineFacts.org. You might expect the content of both sites to be similar, but that's not the case. The former presents arguments about the conflict from the Arab point of view, while the latter defends Israel's role. It's no coincidence that those viewpoints are not readily apparent from the website names. Sites often attempt to raise their search engine ranking and traffic by adopting popular but ambiguous names. Try to guess where ZionismExplained.org and DoingZionism.org fall on the political spectrum. [tinyurl.com/webwar09]

No contemporary cyber-conflict would be complete without Twitter, the social messaging service. In its article, "Winning the propaganda war, in 140 characters or less," the Jerusalem Post recently reported that David Saranga, the head of media relations for the Israeli consulate in New York, has turned to Twitter to help get his message across. [tinyurl.com/webwar12]

While some have mocked trying to discuss the conflict in micro-bursts and shorthand lingo, Saranga defends its use. "Since the definition of war has changed, the definition of public diplomacy has to change as well."

Here's a public Twitter exchange between Saranga and an individual named "backlotops" during the Gaza war. Can you decipher it all? Backlotops: "1 side has to stop. Why continue what hasn't worked (mass arial/grnd retaliation)? Arab Peace Initiative?"

Israelconsulate: "We R pro nego. cmtly tlks r held w the PA + tlks on the 2 state soln. we talk only w/ ppl who accept R rt 2 live." [tinyurl.com/webwar11]

Hitting kids should be banned 'under any circumstances'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tisha b'Av, the ninth day of the month of Av, begins this week on Wednesday evening and continues through daylight hours on Thursday. The annual fast day commemorates the destruction of the First and Second Temples in Jerusalem as well as other tragedies in Jewish history, and the end of the associated three-week mourning period.

Among some two dozen Jewish laws and customs that apply to the three weeks are prohibitions against shaving and listening to music. Less commonly known – and potentially disquieting, especially for those who are unfamiliar with it or lack context – is the cautionary advice against striking one's child.

"It implies that you can hit them at other times," but that's not the case, said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, who also holds a PhD in psychology.

In previous generations, Rabbi Bulka noted, "a patsch here and there was not misunderstood. In our generation, you don't have such assurances."

He is unequivocal when he says that there is "really no room for hitting" children in modern times.

In his congregation, which is Orthodox, the issue "invariably comes up" at this time of year, and the rabbi addresses it in his daily lesson between Minchah and Ma'ariv services.

"I always do it with a chuckle," he said in a phone interview. He tells congregants, "I don't want you to derive any implications from this, because we're living in different times."

His to-the-point advice is: "Don't hit your kid in the three weeks, or for any other of the 49. Love 'em to pieces at all times."

Explaining some of the rationale behind the original law, Rabbi Bulka said, "There were a lot of calamities that happened to the Jewish people [historically, during this time]. God forbid, you don't want another calamity to happen when you hit a child."

Rabbi Immanuel Schochet, a former philosophy professor at Humber College and a leader of the Lubavitch movement in Toronto, said that the three weeks "is a time of misfortune, where even a slight mishap could lead to more serious consequences.

"Ideally, everybody would agree that hitting is not the ideal way," Rabbi Schochet said. "It would be an extraordinary measure, where there seems to be no alternative."

That said, he explained that "even where – how should I put it – physical punishment would be allowed, there is the qualification that one must be in full control of one's emotions. One must never strike out in anger. Anger is more for self-indulgence than education."

He also noted that educational practice "may change with greater insight," such as the knowledge that a child's behaviour is attributable to attention deficit disorder, not rebelliousness.

The goal is not punishment, but rather "the betterment of the child."

"You're never allowed to let off steam on another person – certainly not with a child."

Jewish law in general not only prohibits striking any human being, it prohibits raising one's hand to someone, Rabbi Schochet said, adding that a person who does so is called a rasha, or a wicked person.

Rabbi Mark Dratch – former spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and founder of the West Hempstead, N.Y.-based Jsafe: The Jewish Institute Supporting an Abuse-Free Environment – would also argue that "under any circumstances, [hitting a child] should be prohibited."

He said that is the "general consensus" in the psychologic community.

In some jurisdictions, he noted, it's considered a form of child abuse.

Two dozen countries have outlawed parental corporal punishment, including Israel, New Zealand, Romania, Ukraine, Cyprus and Sweden, according to information provided by Rabbi Dratch.

In Canada, parents and teachers are allowed to use "reasonable" force to correct a child, according to Section 43 of the Criminal Code.

Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family & Child, told The CJN that JF&CS would like to see Section 43 struck down, and is part of "a coalition that has long protested" the section's retention.

Rabbi Dratch said that "physical abuse of children is prohibited. Period. Our question is whether corporal punishment is considered abusive.

"Sources abound indicating that blows that are positively motivated and are intended for a productive purpose are not only tolerated, but may also be mandatory," he told The CJN.

However, there have also been rabbinic authorities who banned corporal punishment, including Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch in the 1800s, he noted.

"Historically, there was an assumption that hitting a child was an appropriate form of discipline," Rabbi Dratch said. "In the days of the Talmud, they tried to restrict the amount of time and the severity of these beatings."

He cited Rabbi Shmuel Bar Shilat, who taught young children in talmudic times and warned that "if you strike children, strike them only with a shoelace."

The proverbial rod, referred to by King Solomon in Proverbs and invoked by some as justification for hitting children, Rabbi Dratch said, "may be a metaphor for proper education and discipline, and not a literal tool."

Couple wishes to integrate

Since landing in Toronto, the Rosembergs have secured the services of an immigration lawyer in an attempt to stay in Canada permanently. They're also keen to meet other Jews and integrate into the community.

"The Toronto Jewish community has received us very well. We've been invited to dinners... and I'm impressed with the way it's organized," Jonathan said, adding that they've been urged by community members to apply to the government as "political refugees."

But the Rosembergs have so far declined to do that, insisting they want to get work and apply for citizenship, and "come into Canada through the front door" if possible, he said.

A sense of place

By JANET FARKAS

Guest Voice

As the water dripped from my fingertips on my 13th lap of the white-tiled pool one day last spring, I began to feel nostalgic for the feeling I had the summer before, when the sun warmed my face as I swam this exact same stroke in the outdoor pool.

At the time, I thought I was swimming my last lengths in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre pool before it closed forever. I've since learned that I will have one more summer of outdoor pleasure before the pool is demolished to make way for a shiny new fitness centre.

The BJCC is a community centre in every sense of the word. It has attracted the young and the old since its inception more than 40 years ago. I remember as a child being struck by the great depth of the empty indoor tank as the guide showed my mother, my sister and I the facilities at the YM-YWHA that was being constructed right in our own neighbourhood.

To this day, I can recall the sensation of water pouring into my mouth as I gasped to catch my breath after doing a somersault into the pool as part of a synchronized swimming rendition of The Wizard of Oz, in which I, as the Cowardly Lion, had never rehearsed my solo with the wool-embellished bathing cap that represented my feline mane.

Soothing body and soul in the chlorinated air

Years of swimming lessons, pleasure swims and races with friends come to mind as my hand slices through the water while I perform my own version of the back crawl this morning.

I greet "the regulars," women in shower caps who don life belts and have regal names such as Malka and Esther. They come for the shmoozing as much as the exercise. Stories about grandchildren, good restaurants and their critiques of the latest movies waft through the chlorinated air.

Many of them prefer the indoor pool, with its warm water and regulated air temperature over the uncertainty of the outdoor climate. I, on the other hand, was the first one in the pool in June, and I hope to be the last one out on Labour Day.

That pool was the first place I visited after the doctors removed the Hickman line from my chest following my cancer treatments. The freedom I felt as I slipped into the comforting water is still there each time I revisit the big L-shaped outdoor pool.

Handsome young men and vibrant young women watch over the swimmers as we follow our own routines. They comment to one another in Russian and think that we don't catch their meaning.

We all have our own meshugas. One man always emerges from the building flushed from his workout and plunges directly into the deep end. Another fusses with his goggles and a bathing cap before starting his front crawl. Miriam is the goodwill ambassador who greets each of us with her welcoming smile and waves, and Elliott boosts everyone's ego by telling them how much he likes them. "I like you too, Elliott," I say.

I definitely benefit from the workout – I try to swim 40 lengths each time – but it's the social aspect that keeps me coming back. After all, it was in this same outdoor pool where, at the age of 14, I not only learned artificial respiration, but how to kiss a boy while pretending to practise mouth-to-mouth resuscitation.

My husband doesn't share my great love of swimming pools and my particular attraction to the BJCC, but he's supportive of my endeavours and knows that whenever I get an opportunity to swim, I seize it. He still refers to our honeymoon as the "Swimming Pool Tour of the East." OK, so I booked us into every hotel and motel in eastern Canada that boasted of a pool among its amenities. I hope that the faint smell of chlorine is still a turn-on for my spouse of some 20-odd years. I am, and always will be, a swimmer.

This is the last summer for my BJCC pool. The indoor pool is closed forever, and the outdoor pool is the last bastion of that sense of place that I feel in the valley near my home in Bathurst Manor. It's where I'm greeted by the lifeguards, the greying gentlemen and the ladies of the deep. We nod to one another and perform our water ballet. Labour Day will come too soon for each of us, and we'll have to find a new location to dip our bodies and soothe our souls.

Janet Farkas lives, and often swims, in Toronto.

Hebrew U researcher pioneers gene research

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — The discoveries made by scientist Howard Cedar may not lead to a cure-all cancer pill, but his research has yielded insights into the causes of cancer that could help identify those most at risk and offer them preventative care.

Cedar, head of the developmental biology and cancer research department at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, spoke to a group of six Canadian journalists in June as part of a six-day tour in Israel sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU), a non-profit group that promotes and raises funds for the school.

The American-born professor, a recipient of the 2008 Wolf Prize – one of Israel's highest honours – first won scientific acclaim about 30 years ago when his research led to a new field of science called epigenetics, the study of changes in gene functions that occur without a change in the sequence of DNA.

Cedar's findings provided scientists with clues as to how genes are regulated at the molecular level.

For his investigation into DNA methylation (chemical changes that occur in DNA molecules), Cedar has since been known as the "father of gene methylation," and has discovered that methylation is involved in 95 per cent of cancer cases.

Cedar, considered Hebrew U's best chance at another Nobel Prize, explained that when methylation occurs, the result is that only one part of the DNA code is available for the cell to read.

For example, a skin cell will only have genetic instructions to make skin, while the rest of its DNA code is "switched off."

When an egg is fertilized, the first bundle of cells produced from it can develop into any cell in the body, because none of its genetic material has been methylated yet, he said.

Hebrew University's Howard Cedar in his office.

But at some stage, the cells begin to assume particular functions – liver cells, skin cells, blood cells, etc.

"For example, the genes in liver cells are expressed, and proteins are made in the cell. Other genes in the liver cells are methylated. They are turned off in the liver cell," Cedar said.

"So you could walk along the DNA, and say, 'This is on, this is off, this is on, this is off.' The reason the liver gets made the way it does is because of the way the switches are turned on… Is this going to be a liver, or is this going to be a kidney?"

This information is relevant to the study of cancer, because now, with scientists having the technology to thoroughly examine cancer cells, they've discovered that cancer is a kind of "switching disease."

In other words, cancers form when genes that are supposed to be turned off are turned on, and vice versa.

He added that regardless of the kind of cancer, methylation occurs in almost every tumour.

In late 2008, Cedar and his Hebrew U colleague Yehudit Bergman identified the mechanism by which human cells assume particular functions. With that information, they learned that genetic diseases such as Fragile X Syndrome – the most common form of developmental disability – also result from a gene that's been turned off that is supposed to be turned on.

"There is nothing wrong with the gene – the gene's fine. We only need to find a way to turn that gene on, like a switch," he said.

Based on research he conducted on mice that were genetically manipulated to develop colon cancer, he and his team discovered that if those same mice were given drugs to inhibit DNA methylation from birth, the disease could be prevented.

Cedar – who is also a researcher at the new Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), for which CFHU has pledged to raise $50 million – said that he's pleased to be partnering with Canadian scientists, including McGill University's Moshe Szyf.

It's one example of the interdisciplinary partnerships made through IMRIC in the hope of giving scientists in various research areas the opportunity to work together to better understand and prevent diseases such as cancer, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's.

Cedar said he is excited about the potential that IMRIC provides and praised Canadian donors for "seeing the bigger picture" and realizing that supporting Israeli scientists means they, too, will benefit from any medical discoveries that come out of Israel.

"We are very lucky that the Canadians love us."

Why do our grads stand out from the crowd?

OUR GRADUATES ARE READY FOR TODAY'S COMPLEX WORLD

Today's social workers face daunting and exciting challenges that demand knowledge and skills spanning both direct practice and policy. At the University of Toronto Factor-Inwentash Faculty of Social Work, our students graduate with all of that and more.

Canada's first school of social work is renowned for integrating research into practice and practice into research. We're distinguished by our collaborative and interdisciplinary programs and award-winning teaching faculty.

With their interprofessional education and five areas of specialization that offer a unique breadth and depth of both academic and practical experience, our grads are ready to become not just exceptional professionals but leaders in their field. They're ready to tackle society's big issues. And they're ready to change lives, communities, and even the world.

Outstanding in any crowd, our graduates are sought by leading social service agencies, education and healthcare institutions, governments and corporations across North America and around the globe. Find out more visit www.socialwork.utoronto.ca

Catching up with 100 years of ketchup

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Photos from the early days of Heinz in Canada.

When my daughter, Jodi, first started dating her husband, Paul, 23 years ago, she was a ketchup addict – she put ketchup on everything, including pizza! Paul was absolutely horrified because he grew up in a house where they almost never used ketchup. Today, Jodi still loves to put ketchup on burgers and fries and she also uses ketchup in her sweet and sour meatballs, but her ketchup intake is under control.

Did you know that next to Finland, Canadians consume more ketchup than anyone else in the world? This summer, Heinz Canada is celebrating its 100th anniversary and has developed a recipe for The Great Canadian Heinz Ketchup Cake as a novel way to use it for more than fries and burgers. The cake is unexpectedly red, perfectly spiced and totally delicious – giving it the taste of carrot cake without all the work.

Canadians have the chance to win $25,000 in cash or one of 100 instant win Broil King barbecues from now until Aug. 31 with the Heinz Ketchup Fan of the Century contest. Enter at Heinzitup.com and, in 100 words or less, explain why you are the biggest Heinz Ketchup fan of all time.

Here are two terrific recipes that use ketchup as a main ingredient. The meatball recipe comes from Second Helpings Please and has been passed down from generation to generation. It's the number 1 recipe on my website http://www.gourmania.com. Enjoy…

GREAT CANADIAN HEINZ KETCHUP CAKE

2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
1 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tsp. baking soda
1/2 tsp. each ground nutmeg and ginger
1/2 cup Heinz tomato ketchup
1/2 cup water
2 tbsp. red food colouring
3/4 cup butter, softened
1 1/2 cups packed dark brown sugar
2 eggs

Frosting:
6 oz. brick-style cream cheese, softened
3/4 cup butter, softened
1 tsp. vanilla extract
4 cups icing sugar

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease two 9-inch round cake pans and line the bottoms with parchment paper.

Stir the flour with the baking powder, cinnamon, baking soda, nutmeg and ginger into a bowl.

Stir the ketchup, water and colouring in a separate bowl. Set aside.

Beat the butter and blend in the sugar in a large bowl until smooth. Beat in the eggs. Add the flour mixture and ketchup mixture. Beat on low, scraping down the bowl as needed, until combined. Increase the speed to medium-high and beat for 1 minute. Divide the batter evenly between the prepared pans. Bake for 30 minutes or until the centre springs back when touched lightly. Cool the cakes for 15 minutes before turning onto a rack to cool completely.

Frosting: Beat the cream cheese, butter and vanilla on medium speed for 2 minutes or until smooth. Gradually beat in the sugar on low, scraping the bowl as needed. Beat on high until fluffy. Frost between the cake layers and over the sides and top of the cake. Makes 12 servings.

TANGY SWEET & SOUR MEATBALLS

Source: Second Helpings Please
1 1/2 lb. minced meat
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 clove garlic, minced
1 egg
2 tbsp. matzah meal
1 1/2 cups ketchup
2 cups ginger ale

Combine first 6 ingredients and form into small balls. Combine ketchup and ginger ale in a large saucepan and bring to a boil. Drop meatballs into sauce, cover and simmer for 2 hours. Yield: 6 servings as an appetizer, 4 servings as a main course.

Treasured witnesses to Jewish antiquity

By HINDY NAJMAN, EVA MROCZEK AND CHAD STAUBER

Guest Voice

The Dead Sea Scrolls recently arrived in Toronto – each in its own business class seat – and have taken up residence at the Royal Ontario Museum (ROM). Now, after well over two years of hard work by an international team, including Dan Rahimi, the ROM's vice-president of gallery development, and former Torontonian Prof. Risa Levitt Kohn, curator, these precious witnesses to the ancient Jewish past are on display until Jan. 3, 2010.

The Scrolls exhibition has generated great interest among the public in Toronto, but it's also a tremendous boon for the University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies and its academic program in ancient Judaism.

Many people have heard of the Dead Sea Scrolls, but few know the details of their discovery and fewer still understand their significance. The story of the scrolls' discovery sounds like a tale from the Arabian Nights.

Bedouin goatherders stumble upon a cave on a rock-face which leads down to the Dead Sea near an ancient site called Khirbet Qumran (Arabic for 'Ruins of Qumran'). One of the brothers throws a stone inside and hears a vessel shatter. Excited by the prospect of finding hidden treasure, but fearful of confronting a guardian jinn (genie) protecting it, the brothers go back to their tent to discuss their next move. The next morning, the eldest brother, Mohammed ed-Dhib (the Wolf) arises early to beat the others to the riches. What he finds greatly disappoints him: not the hoped-for treasure, but mottled rolls of musty parchment. Nevertheless, within a few years, the world would hail this discovery as one of the greatest of the 20th century.

For nearly 1,000 years, the cave had housed seven of the best-preserved scrolls from Jewish antiquity, now known as the Manual of Discipline, the War Scroll, the Thanksgiving Scroll, the Genesis Apocryphon, and a Commentary on Habbakuk, as well as two copies of the Book of Isaiah.

Over the next 10 years or so, archeologists would find a total of 11 caves in the vicinity of Khirbet Qumran, yielding some 25,000 fragments from which 800 to 900 other scrolls could be reconstructed. They were written primarily in Hebrew, with some in Aramaic, and a few small fragments in ancient Greek.

In the years after their discovery, it became more and more apparent that the scrolls would change the face of biblical scholarship. Remnants of every book of the Hebrew Bible, except Esther and Nechemiah, were recovered from the caves.

The presence of old fragments of the Hebrew Bible may not sound so amazing, but it becomes quite astounding when one bears in mind that up until the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the oldest complete Hebrew manuscript of the Masoretic Text (the Jewish Bible in Hebrew and Aramaic) dated from 1008 CE. Suddenly biblical scholars were given access to evidence that was 1,200 years older than the oldest texts they had previously known.

On the one hand, the continuity is remarkable: biblical texts found among the Dead Sea Scrolls differ from the texts read by Jews today in only minor ways that are of interest mainly to scholars. On the other hand, a largely unfamiliar world comes into view, thanks to the non-biblical or "sectarian" texts, reflecting perspectives that differ from the Rabbinic Judaism that would become mainstream over the subsequent centuries.

Debates about who inhabited Qumran and who hid the scrolls are ongoing. Most identify those who produced and preserved the scrolls as the Essenes, although this identification is subject to vigorous challenge. In any event, scrolls such as the Manual of Discipline and the War Scroll were written from the perspective of a group that believed they were the true "chosen people," the "Sons of Light," in opposition to all other Jews and foreigners, whom they called the "Sons of Darkness."

This group produced some of the earliest surviving midrashic texts, such as the Commentary of Habakkuk, which reinterpreted the ancient prophets, applying their words to the sectarians' own time. Some of the halachic views expressed in the scrolls appear in Rabbinic literature as minority opinions, worthy of mention but not considered normative.

For the Jewish community, then, this exhibition opens a window onto a rich and vibrant ancient time, when various traditions of interpretation of Torah, Halachah and prayer were emerging. Some found their place within Rabbinic Judaism, while others were incorporated into early Christianity, and still others reappeared centuries later with the rise of Islam.

The Scrolls on display during the first rotation include portions of texts such as the book of Daniel and a collection of Psalms, a fragment of the so-called Book of the War (related to the War Scroll mentioned above) and the Damascus Document, a legendized history of the origins of the community that preserved the Scrolls. While the texts appear in fragmentary form and have suffered some deterioration, much of the writing is still legible. The script is not very different from what we find in a modern Tanach, and a patient Hebrew reader, leaning over a display case at the ROM, can make out the very words that a Jewish scribe inked on his scroll more than 2,000 years ago.

The richness of the Scrolls' cultural and historical context is reflected in the magnificent exhibition, which allows us not only to see some of the fragments, but also to catch a glimpse of the complex world – both Jewish and Greco-Roman – from which they came.

Thanks to the expertise of Levitt Kohn, a Toronto native who attended both York University and U of T and who now directs the Jewish studies program at San Diego State University, the Scrolls are firmly placed within their context, among artifacts from Qumran, Jerusalem, Sepphoris and other parts of Judea and Galilee.

In addition to presenting the artifacts and fragments for viewing, the ROM has given us an auditory experience as well. As we walk through the dramatic, darkened space where the fragments are displayed, we hear recordings of selected texts recited in Hebrew, Aramaic and Greek, reminding us that in antiquity, many people experienced these words primarily by hearing them.

What the Scrolls meant in their own context, and what they contribute to our current understanding of how traditions developed, are questions that drive scholars of ancient Judaism throughout the academic world.

We are all indebted to the ROM and to the Israel Antiquities Authority for bringing the scrolls to Toronto and to the Tanenbaum family for the Anne Tanenbaum lecture series, featuring leading Dead Sea Scolls authorities from around the world, that will run for the benefit of the public concurrently with the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit.

This is a remarkable gift for all of us to enjoy as we learn about what unites us as Jews and also about the backdrop against which the three monotheistic faiths emerged.

Prof. Hindy Najman is the director of the Centre for Jewish Studies and a member of the Department and Centre for the Study of Religion at the University of Toronto. Eva Mroczek and Chad Stauber are PhD candidates at U of T.

Scrolls conference to feature wide array of scholars

The Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition at the ROM is also the occasion for an academic conference, The Dead Sea Scrolls: Transmission of Traditions and Production of Texts, set for Nov. 15 to 18 in Toronto.

It will be the most important Dead Sea Scrolls conference ever held in Canada, attracting top scholars from Israel, North America and Europe. The conference is being organized by Alex Gropper, president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies and a longtime teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, as well as by professors Sarianna Metso and Hindy Najman of the University of Toronto, and Prof. Eileen Schuller from McMaster University. It's being chaired by Miguel Singer and Barry Zagdanski.

The organizers have also invited a group of 15 scholars to give academic presentations geared toward university faculty and graduate students.

In addition, several lectures are planned for the general community by top scholars such as Prof. James Kugel of Harvard University and Bar-Ilan University and Emanuel Tov of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The conference will also serve as an opportunity for training young scholars as well as high school students from TanenbaumCHAT to learn about the Scrolls and ancient Judaism from world-renowned experts in the field.

On Campus

'We're taking seriously all the issues'

In an effort to improve the tense atmosphere between student groups on campus, in March, Shoukri initiated the Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community to work on developing recommendations toward that end.

The task force, headed by Osgoode Hall Law School dean and incoming York provost Patrick Monahan – who sat in on the meeting at The CJN's office – called on members of the community to submit recommendations on how to improve the climate at York.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and Hillel of Greater Toronto submitted a report to the task force in June and are anticipating the task force's report at the end of August.

"I really can't get into a lot of details other than to say that at this time, we're taking seriously all the issues that have been brought to our attention… [The task force members make up] a diverse group and we're working by consensus," Monahan said.

Shoukri added that the report will be made public.

"We will not shy away from saying, 'We will do this, but this we cannot do for whatever reason.' We will be very open with our community," he said.

Another issue that concerned many members of the Jewish community was the York-sponsored conference in June called Israel/Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace.

The concern stemmed from the fact that a large majority of the speakers promoted a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – a solution that would mean the end of a Jewish state – and some speakers were activists in the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel.

Although Shoukri reiterated his position on academic freedom, he said he plans to commission "an independent, highly respected person… to have a look, interview people and review what went on in planning and in our own decisions and advise us on the lessons learned" from the conference experience.

With York facing pressure from the Jewish community to protect its students from intimidation, as well as confronting a 10 per cent drop in applications for the 2009-10 academic year, Shoukri said he's focused on learning from past incidents, moving forward and strengthening the university's academic capacity.

"That will be achieved by building on what we have and expanding our presence in science, applied sciences and different disciplines," Shoukri said.

"We are focusing on modernizing our organizational structure to make sure that we become a more efficient organization and make sure that our financial and budgetary decisions are aligned with our academic priorities."

He added that he is excited about the "urbanization" of York.

"Our campus is undergoing incredible change. It will not be a suburban campus. Think of it this way: In 2014 or 2015, you will have two subway stations – one in the middle of campus and one at the edge of campus," Shoukri said.

"We have a clear agenda… We know what we want and we are trying to provide the tools – the administrative tools, the decision-making tools – that will allow us to move in a very clear direction."

שישאר בינינו
גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

ברק ורעם

Debunking a long-held falsehood

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On July 8, the New York Times printed an excerpt from Myths, Illusions, and Peace, a book on the Arab-Israeli peace process, by Dennis Ross and David Makovsky.

In the excerpt, headlined "Linkage: The Mother of all Myths," Ross and Makovsky confront head-on one of the most persistent misunderstandings about the Middle East: the idea "that ending the Arab-Israeli conflict is prerequisite to addressing the maladies of the Middle East. Solve it, and in doing so conclude all other conflicts. Fail, and instability – even war – will engulf the entire region."

This notion has been advanced for decades by not only Palestinian and Arab leaders, but also key European and American officials. "The problem with this premise," Ross and Makovsky argue, "is that it is not true."

The authors list numerous Middle East conflicts and coups that had nothing to do with the Arab-Israel conflict: for example, the Iran-Iraq War (1980-88); the Persian Gulf War (1990-91) and the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

Ross and Makovsky continue: "Since the origins of so many regional tensions and rivalries are not connected to the Arab-Israeli conflict, it is hard to see how resolving it would unlock other regional stalemates or sources of instability. Iran, for example, is not pursuing its nuclear ambitions because there is an Arab-Israeli conflict. Sectarian groups in Iraq would not suddenly put aside their internal struggles if the Palestinian issue were resolved. Like so many conflicts in the region, these struggles have their own dynamic."

They also point out that, while the Israeli-Palestinian dispute must be resolved, contrary to widespread misperception, "it has not spilled over to destabilize the Middle East."

The excerpt concludes with some rhetorical questions: "Yet the argument of linkage endures to this day, and with powerful promoters. Why does it persist? And why has it been accepted among top policymakers as if it is factually correct?"

One reason is that the conflict has been a convenient excuse for Arab and Muslim leaders to avoid problems with their own inept and often corrupt, repressive governance, and shift the blame to Israel. Even in Egypt and Jordan, countries that have reached peace agreements with Israel, anti-Israel (and anti-Jewish) vitriol has abated only somewhat – again providing an outlet for oppressed citizens to vent their frustrations, while keeping the ruling regimes above the fray.

Also ignored is the fact that Islamic powers and parties such as Iran and Hamas may trumpet the "plight of the Palestinians," but they don't want to see a peaceful resolution to the conflict. For them, the final outcome can only be the disappearance of Israel. A two-state solution or any reconciliation with Israel as a Jewish state is only a cause for further conflict.

Thus, the oft-heard complaint that the failure to create a Palestinian state is fuelling Islamic radicalism in the Middle East and beyond has inverted the truth: this radicalism feeds on the perpetuation of the conflict and would not be assuaged by any resolution that leaves Israel in place and in peace.

Yet, according to Howard W. French in a review of Myths, Illusions, and Peace ("Debunking Commonplaces About a Singular Region," New York Times, July 8), the Ross-Makovsky argument against linkage is "somewhat overstated."

In a May 28 review of the book, the Economist magazine also found the anti-linkage argument not without merit but "overdone." It argued that the authors want the United States to pursue peace to defuse a conflict that "is stoking Islamic radicalism and anti-Americanism." The Economist failed to note that, for Ross and Makovsky, the pursuit of genuine Arab-Israeli peace is important in its own terms, not because it will neutralize a mythical reason for a rise in Islamic extremism.

Ross and Makovsky have pointed Middle East analysts in a useful direction: toward clear, factually based thinking, and away from blind, persistent myth-making.

Arab-Israeli journalist criticizes Obama's Middle East policies

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An Arab-Israeli journalist who is a Muslim said that U.S. President Barack Obama made a big mistake in not supporting Iranian protesters more forcefully in the wake of Iran's recent presidential election.

Many Iranians, as well as some western countries, say the election was fraudulent.

Obama's reticence only emboldened Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to clamp down on protestors, the Jerusalem Post's Khaled Abu Toameh told journalists at a recent lunch meeting organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee. Toameh met subsequently with journalists in Toronto as well.

And that in turn emboldened Hamas in Gaza to feel secure in its continued stranglehold there.

"This has all made Hamas stronger," Toameh said, because Hamas depends on Iranian support to stay in power.

When the protests began, he said, "Hamas people were worried that Ahmadinejad would fall."

But that didn't turn out to be the case. While discontent persists within a "large portion" of Iranian society and will eventually either bring reform or bring down Ahmadinejad, Obama's reaction was a case of "too little, too late," Toameh said

"Moderate" Arab regimes such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia, who don't like Ahmadinejad or his country's territorial and nuclear ambitions any more than Israel does, were also concerned about Obama's response, he said.

Toameh, who has worked as a journalist for the New York Times, the U.S. News and World Report and NBC, started his career with a Palestine Liberation Organization publication called Al-Fajr.

But it didn't take long for Toameh to appreciate the difference between the PLO's completely controlled media and Israel's totally free and open version.

"There's just no comparing them," he said.

Toameh also said that no comparison could be made between Israel's freedoms – which he said are greatly envied by many if not most Arabs and Palestinians – and the lives of the people in the other countries of the region.

Khaled Abu Toameh is a journalist at the Jerusalem Post.

Deep down, Toameh said, "the majority of us want to live with Israel or in Israel," with more than a few even anxious to acquire Israeli passports.

He dismissed the notion increasingly heard outside Israel that it is an "apartheid" society that should be boycotted.

"I am an Arab Israeli and can tell you Israel is not an apartheid state," he said.

Israel should, however, devote more resources to supporting the Arab sectors within Israeli society, he added.

Sometimes, Toameh said a bit facetiously, he feels safer speaking his views, however supportive of Israel they may appear, "in Ramallah than on university campuses here [in North America]."

Regarding the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Toameh said Obama has made an error by focusing on Israel's settlement policies, instead of the corruption that continues to permeate the Palestinian Authority (PA) under Fatah.

"Remember, it was Fatah's corruption that brought Hamas to power in Gaza," Toameh said.

He said that encouraging coexistence and the building of a true civil society within the PA, one not led by weak and corrupt leaders, but by those "capable of delivering," would be the first real step toward peace.

"The PA is a total failure," Toameh said. "The biggest problem is no leadership among the Palestinians."

He described PA leader Mahmoud Abbas as both weak and corrupt, and no different than all the Palestinian leaders who preceded him.

Ironically, Toameh said, Israel has to keep propping up Fatah in the PA because the alternative – Hamas – is worse. "The PA," he said, "is in power only because of the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] keeping them."

He said nothing less than a real war now exists between Hamas and Fatah. If elections were held again in Gaza today, he said, Hamas would win.

In Toameh's view, the only way to undermine Hamas is to "give Palestinians a better alternative."

"We have to help the Palestinians help themselves," he said. "We need strong and reliable partners, but Abu Mazen [Abbas] is simply not capable of governing."

Within Israel itself, Toameh said, most Israeli Arabs would prefer to live as citizens of Israel, but an Israel that does not "discriminate."

In the Knesset, he said, Arab MK voices are becoming increasingly "radicalized" and want to "disconnect" from the Jewish state.

Toameh does not believe most Arab-Israelis feel the same way and said they want to fight "for integration, not separation."

JEWISH AND MUSLIM INTERFAITH DIALOGUE: A group of 28 rabbis and imams from 11 European countries attempted to balance lofty ideals with complex religious and political realities at the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding's inaugural conference of European religious leaders. The conference was held in New York and Washington over four days during the third week of July. Participants visited Ellis Island, Yankee Stadium, the 96th Street Mosque, Yeshiva University, the White House and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Pictured with some of the conference participants in front of New York City Hall are Karen Mock, fourth from left, and beside her, on her left, Shahid Akhtar. Mock and Akhtar represented the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims at the conference, and made a presentation about interfaith dialogue programs between Jews and Muslims in Canada.

Author discovers nuggets of Montreal Jewish history

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — David Lewis, future leader of the New Democratic Party, was on the fast track in Britain's Labour Party, and even considered prime ministerial material as a young man.

Lewis (Losh), who was born 100 years ago in Russia and grew up in a poor immigrant family in Montreal, is believed to the first Canadian Jew to win a Rhodes Scholarship.

While at Oxford, Lewis was a power debater and advocate of socialism, having masterfully overcome the disadvantage of his late acquisition of English. The young Montrealer caught the eye of future Labour leader Michael Foote. Lewis was asked to run as a Labour candidate in a safe seat and was offered a position in the prominent law firm of party leader Stafford Cripps, who believed Lewis should be in the cabinet when the party returned to power.

But Lewis decided to return to Canada, and soon became national secretary of the new Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, forerunner of the NDP.

This bit of little-known information can be gleaned from the recently published Fabled City: The Jews of Montreal by Joe King.

Just when you thought King must have exhausted his stock of anecdotes about Jewish Montreal, King has come out with another book of stories about interesting Jewish personalities – both prominent and obscure – who have contributed to not only the community, but the city, the province, the country and sometimes beyond as well.

They left their mark in a wide range of fields from commerce to medicine and philanthropy, as well as public life and culture, and less traditional endeavours.

Fabled City (Price-Patterson) follows on King's popular From the Ghetto to the Main (2000) and its sequel, Baron Byng to Bagels (2006). He calls Fabled City the fruit of 40 years of research in archives, libraries and other primary sources.

At 85, King also knew first-hand many of the people he writes about, first as a print and then television journalist, and later as a community professional, notably during his many years as public relations director of Allied Jewish Community Services, as Federation CJA was then called.

> Who served the first smoked-meat sandwiches in Montreal?

King has recycled some of the material from his earlier books, and other information is well-known to anyone with a knowledge of the Montreal Jewish community.

But the book is organized in a readable way, centring on more than 50 different individuals and vignettes, divided into 30 short chapters, and spanning the 250 years of official Jewish presence in Quebec. As is noted on the introductory page, Jews may have earlier set foot on this land, but by French decree, only Roman Catholics were allowed to live in New France.

How many knew that a Jew was second-in-command in the British navy at the time of Gen. James Wolfe's victory on the Plains of Abraham, that a Jewish engineer introduced hydro-electric power to Quebec, or that Montreal once had a Jewish police chief. Not all of King's subjects are heroes and saints; he includes a chapter on the Jewish Mafia.

The profiles are not only historic. Jews who are prominent today are also sketched, including those who helped sponsor the book's publication, including Thomas Hecht and David Azrieli

Fabled City touches on some of the issues that gripped Montreal Jewry, from the serious to the light-hearted, from the fight to lift the barriers to Jewish immigration in the 1930s to the still-raging debate over who served the first smoked-meat sandwiches in Montreal.

It's entertaining reading for anyone, no matter how much they thought they knew, and valuable for young people not so well-versed in the past. As with King's earlier books, he expects this one to be popular with nostalgic former Montrealers scattered around the world.

The book is illustrated with 379 photos, many of them archival. Some of the most eye-catching are those from family albums, such as the picture of Mildred Bronfman's (daughter of Abe) 1936 wedding to Bernard Lande, in which she wears a dress with a very long train, and the photograph of a teenage Tom Hecht with his parents and sisters soon after their arrival in Montreal in the early 1940s from Europe.

King explains in his preface that his mission is to continue to record what Jews have accomplished despite what he calls "the stupidity" of anti-Semitism.

"This book chronicles only a tiny segment of the immense Jewish contribution to the growth of Montreal. It would take a thick encyclopedia to outline the entire story," he writes, which means readers can probably look forward to more tales from the fabled city.

There are three "villains" in King's book – prime minister Mackenzie King, his Quebec lieutenant and justice minister, Ernest Lapointe, and Vincent Massey, then high commissioner to Britain – who failed to respond to the desperate plight of Jews persecuted by Nazism, the worst record of any western nation.

This callousness was Canada's loss, King argues. "Never in the history of mankind was there a greater opportunity for a country to benefit from the treasure-trove of genius fleeing Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia and other countries."

Credit for the title goes to another great Jewish Montrealer, A.M. Klein, whose poem Autobiographical contains the lines: "It is a fabled city that I seek/ It stands in Space's vapours and Time's haze/ Thence comes my sadness in remembered joy..."

Joe King's Fabled City: The Jews of Montreal is lavishly illustrated with archival photos. The book is expected to be popular with former Montrealers.

Visual artist... focuses on her survivor grandparents

By SARAH PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Jessica Thalmann's family history was altered forever by the events of the Holocaust.

In her most recent artistic endeavour, Thalmann, the grandchild of survivors, explored the nightmare from behind her camera lens and through the eyes of her grandparents.

During last year's fall semester, the 20-year-old York University visual arts and English literature major was assigned a heritage project. Her photography teacher instructed the third-year class to use art as an investigative tool to examine a part of their identity.

"We got the assignment right before the strike and I thought, 'Thank God,'" Thalmann said, referring to what turned out to be an open deadline due to last year's work stoppage by York teaching assistants and sessional staff.

"I don't use my identity in my artwork at all. I actually hate that."

Jessica Thalmann

She looked to her grandparents, both Holocaust survivors, as inspiration and used their images to convey the past and the future as a way to illustrate her identity.

"The project started out for my grandparents, but it has developed into something for a larger community. For people like them – for people who want their stories told and don't know how or have the means to tell it."

For the assignment, Thalmann photocopied old pictures of her grandparents from the 1930s onto transparency sheets and projected the images onto her grandparents.

The snapshots illustrate the spaces in which Harry and Mania Auerbach have lived out their lives – and, as Holocaust survivors, it's a miracle they lived at all.

In this way, the images are an affirmation of their lives, Thalmann said.

"I wanted to also capture them as they are right now on film so that I have a document that will last a very long time," she said. "It was really hard to be so self-reflective and look at my grandparents in that kind of way."

Thalmann has always been interested in artistic expression and, at the age of 17, she held her first exhibition in her last year of high school at the Toronto French School's annual International Baccalaureate Arts Show.

For the event, Thalmann completed a series of paintings inspired by her daily commute to school, in which she took the TTC from suburban Thornhill into the busy city streets of Toronto.

"We were underground together in a confined space, very intimate in a way that one doesn't think about, doesn't want to think about. How do we interact as a city, as a people, in these spaces? How don't we interact?"

The project made her realize that she was destined to be an artist.

"That was really my first taste of art, and I loved it," Thalmann said. "I knew I wanted to be an artist. I just didn't know how that would come about."

Thalmann is the most recent recipient of York's Willowdale Award, which recognizes exceptional achievement in painting by an upper-level undergraduate student, and she'll have an opportunity to present a solo show in the university's Gales Gallery.

She is also president of York's Creative Arts Students Association and vice-president of the Visual Arts Student Association.

In March 2009, at the Whippersnapper Gallery on Queen Street in Toronto, Thalmann and fellow York fine arts students put together an exhibition of their talents. Their goal was to develop an inclusive artistic community of York students.

"York has a very fragmented student body, especially in fine arts," said Thalmann. "I found that we could extend its identity into the downtown Toronto scene, where not a lot of York kids are represented. What I am trying to do with my peers is to make York visible."

She wants to expand her Holocaust remembrance project by finding more people willing to talk to her or allow her to photograph them.

"It's important for young Jews or young individuals to understand – despite how hard it is – the ramifications of such an event. And even if it does hurt, we are descendants of such a traumatic event, and we can't negate the importance of something like that," she said.

"I think photographs are documents of memory and change over time, but memory is something that is fickle. But we rely on it in a way and it is something that we can't really understand. I like that nature and I tried to play with it."

More than just a document of the passage of time, Thalmann's images show both the resiliency and vulnerability of her grandparents. Her series is haunting and the photographs question our understanding of history, heritage, identity, trauma and memory.

Thalmann presented her work at the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition in Nathan Philips Square earlier this month and plans to take part in this year's Nuit Blanche in Toronto on Oct. 3.

Thalmann was inspired by her grandparents, Holocaust survivors, when she was given a photography assignment to use art to investigate her own identity.

Rabbis arrested in N.J. sting

JTA

WASHINGTON — Several rabbis were arrested as part of a public corruption and international money-laundering investigation in New Jersey.

According to reports, among the 44 people arrested last Thursday morning by the FBI, along with the rabbis, were the mayors of three New Jersey towns, a deputy mayor and a state assembly member. They were to appear in federal court in Newark later in the day.

The money-laundering suspects were accused of moving "at least tens of millions of dollars through charitable, nonprofit entities controlled by rabbis in New York and New Jersey," according to a release by acting U.S. Attorney Ralph Marra.

Prosecutors said they worked with an informant who had been charged with bank fraud in May 2006, Bloomberg.com said. Investigators obtained hundreds of hours of audio and video recordings, according to prosecutors.

The rabbis arrested were religious leaders from Syrian Jewish neighbourhoods in Deal and Elberon, N.J., as well as Brooklyn, N.Y. The Asbury Park Press reported that the investigation involved the Deal Yeshiva, a Sephardi institution that has a boys' division in Ocean Township and a girls' school in West Long Branch.

The arrests reportedly are the result of a two-year probe by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Internal Revenue Service that began with an investigation of money transfers by members of the Syrian enclaves in Deal and Brooklyn, two tight-knit and wealthy communities.

The Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office and the IRS removed at least three boxes from the Deal Yeshiva as students were arriving at school last Thursday, the Star-Ledger reported, as well as several boxes from Congregation Ohel Yaacob in the same town.

The charged rabbis include Rabbi Saul Kassin, 87, of Congregation Shaare Zion in Brooklyn, N.Y.; Rabbi Eliahu Ben Haim, 58, the principal rabbi of Congregation Ohel Yaacob in Deal; Rabbi Edmond Nahum, 56, of the Deal Synagogue; Rabbi Mordchai Fish, 56, of Congregation Sheves Achim in Brooklyn; and Rabbi Lavel Schwartz, 57, Rabbi Fish's brother. They were charged with money laundering.

Rabbi Kassin is accused of laundering more than $200,000 through the informant from June 2007 through December 2008, according to prosecutors. Rabbi Fish, Rabbi Schwartz and two other defendants used a charitable, tax-exempt organization called BCG, which was associated with Rabbi Fish's synagogue, to launder money, according to the FBI.

The mayors of Hoboken, Ridgefield and Secaucus, the deputy mayor of Jersey City and an assembly member from Ocean Township were caught in the operation.

Also charged is Rabbi Levy-Izhak Rosenbaum, 58, of Brooklyn, who was accused of conspiring with others to acquire and trade human organs for use in transplantation. In one case noted in the complaint, Rabbi Rosenbaum said it would cost $150,000 – half up front. Rabbi Rosenbaum said some of the money would go to the donor and some to doctors in Israel, according to the complaint.

Bloomberg identified the co-operating witness as Solomon Dwek, a real estate developer in Monmouth County, N.J., who was charged in 2006 with scheming to defraud PNC Bank out of $50 million, according to a person familiar with the matter and court records. Dwek was never indicted. He has received 17 extensions to continue the period in which his case had to be presented to a federal grand jury.

U.S. representatives meet with Israel and her neighbours

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United States are working to advance "common interests," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said at the start of the weekly cabinet meeting.

He was speaking of this week's "important" visits to Israel by U.S. Secretary of Defence Robert Gates, Middle East special envoy George Mitchell and national security adviser Gen. James Jones.

Netanyahu said the visits are being held as part of a tight network of links between Israel and the United States "that has existed in the past and will to continue to exist in the present.

"Our common interests encompass all the main areas of bilateral co-operation," he said. "I believe that such an intensive continuity in contacts with the U.S. reflects our common denominator in the search for security stability, economic development, diplomatic progress and other strategic issues. This network of relations is important and steadfast."

Netanyahu downplayed differences between Israel and the United States on issues such as a freeze in settlement construction.

"Naturally, even within the fabric of friendly bilateral relations between two allies, there will not be full agreement on every point," the Israeli leader said. "On various-issues, we are trying to reach the same understanding so that together we may advance our common goals – peace, security and prosperity for the entire Middle East."

U.S. special envoy Mitchell called differences between Israel and the United States "discussions among friends" and "not disputes among adversaries."

Mitchell met Sunday evening in Tel Aviv with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Olmert as part of a series of meetings scheduled this week in the region.

"The American commitment to Israel's security is unshakable and will not change," Mitchell reportedly told Barak.

Barak told Mitchell that Israel is "willing to do all it takes to help" achieve peace in the region "while maintaining our vital interests. We understand the partners' needs, and we undoubtedly could use Mitchell's experience and wisdom in order to try and achieve this."

Mitchell met Sunday morning in Damascus with Syrian President Bashar Assad, and he called on Syria to help bring about peace in the Middle East.

"If we are to succeed, we will need Arabs and Israelis alike to work with us to bring about comprehensive peace," Mitchell told reporters following his meeting with Assad, Ha'aretz reported. "We will welcome the full co-operation of the government of the Syrian Arab Republic in this historic endeavour."

Mitchell said that restarting talks between Israel and Syria in the near future is one of the goals of President Barack Obama's administration. Turkey has said it is ready to resume mediation of those talks.

Syria continues to be under U.S. sanctions over its support for Hamas, but the United States under Obama recently sent an ambassador to the country for the first time in more than four years.

Sanctions against Iran still a possibility

Gates, for his part, said that U.S. President Barack Obama, having offered to engage Iran over its disputed nuclear program, hopes for a response to the overture by late September.

"I think that the president is certainly anticipating or hoping for some kind of response this fall, perhaps by the time of the UN General Assembly," Gates told reporters.

Gates said that sanctions were a possibility if diplomacy fails, while also mentioning plans for a loosely defined defence umbrella meant to protect U.S. allies in the region.

"We will continue to ensure that Israel has the most advanced weapons for its national defence," he said.

Barak stressed that the schedule for U.S.-led engagement with Iran should be kept short.

The United States and Israel believe Iran is attempting to develop atomic weapons. Israel sees a nuclear-armed Iran as an existential threat, particularly in light of bellicose comments from Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Tehran's support for violent anti-Israel militant groups. Iran says its nuclear program is exclusively aimed at producing electricity.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu later met with Gates in what his office described as a "highly positive atmosphere." The two discussed a comprehensive range of bilateral, diplomatic, defence and strategic issues.

A large part of the discussion was devoted to Iran. Gates said that the United States and Israel see eye to eye regarding the Iranian nuclear threat and that the United States engagement with Tehran will not be open-ended.

Netanyahu reiterated the seriousness with which Israel views Iran's nuclear ambitions and the need to utilize all available means to prevent Iran from achieving nuclear weapons capability.

OSCE endorses resolution to tackle anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The OSCE Parliamentary Assembly recently concluded its annual conference in Vilnius by adopting a declaration that included resolutions on steps to address anti-Semitism and to promote free trade in the Mediterranean basin.

The Vilnius Declaration, passed by the assembly, which includes parliamentarians from 56 democratic countries, calls on member states and legislators to take action against "the dramatic increase in recorded anti-Semitic hate crimes and attacks targeting Jewish persons and property." The resolution also warned against "incidents of government-backed anti-Semitism in general and state-backed genocidal anti-Semitism in particular."

(Iran has been accused by MP Irwin Cotler and others of advocating genocidal anti-Semitism against Israel.)

The OSCE has passed resolutions since 2002 condemning anti-Semitism. This year's resolution was proposed by Canadian Senator Jerry Grafstein, vice-president of the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly.

In a speech to the assembly, Grafstein pointed out that more than 300,000 Jews lived in Lithuania before the Holocaust and that 95 per cent were "hunted and slaughtered… It is important here in Vilnius that we remember what happened and record our opposition to anti-Semitism."

A second resolution called for "creation of a free trade area [which] will… contribute significantly to the efforts to achieve peace in the Mediterranean region."

Grafstein said trade between Israel and its Arab neighbours could lay the basis for improved political relations.

Private property issue looms large over Polish-Jewish relations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

WARSAW, Poland — Poland continues to grapple with one of the last unresolved legacies of the Nazi and Communist eras.

Seventy years after its occupation by Germany in World War II and 20 years since its liberation from the yoke of Soviet communism, Poland has yet to pass restitution legislation to compensate Poles for lost private property.

By all accounts, Jews, who comprised about 10 per cent of Poland's pre-war population, account for almost 20 per cent of the claimants.

Under a 1997 agreement, Poland has begun to return communal property. But according to the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, which has discussed the issue with Polish representatives, Poland is the only major country in the former Soviet bloc not to have settled this thorny problem.

Last year, the then-prime minister of Poland, Jaroslaw Kaczcynski, and Poland's ambassador to Israel, Agnieszka Magdziak-Miszewska, both promised that the government would work to adopt a law to redress the issue.

Yet to this day, Poland has not lived up to its promise.

According to Stanislaw Krajewski, a member of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland, and a founder of the Polish-Israeli Friendship Society, there have been 10 attempts to resolve the issue since Poland's peaceful passage to democracy in 1989.

Eight years ago, the then-president of Poland, Aleksander Kwasniewski, vetoed such a bill, saying it violated the constitution and would be too costly to bear. In 2006, the Polish government submitted draft legislation proposing compensation for confiscated private property. But the bill was limited in scope, not including properties in Warsaw, the capital, and offering only 20 cents per dollar.

"It's a massive problem because millions of people are involved," said Krajewski, a Warsaw University philosophy professor. "It would be a huge financial burden on Poland."

By one estimate, Jewish property claims run the gamut from $30 to $40 billion (US), this at a time when Poland is struggling with a deepening recession that is expected to grow still worse in 2010.

The issue is exacerbated by two factors. Nearly half of Warsaw's infrastructure was destroyed during the war and replaced by new buildings, and some of the areas populated by Jews before 1939 lie outside Poland's present border.

In a recent interview in Warsaw, the chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, an advocate of Polish-Jewish reconciliation, said that Poland's failure to expedite the problem is a "major moral stain" on its soul.

Last year, in a piece in a Polish daily newspaper, the president of the World Jewish Congress, Ronald Lauder, wrote, "To deny the return of stolen property or adequate compensation violates basic democratic principles. Such a denial to a Holocaust victim is a double humiliation. People who barely survived the war and later learned that everything they owned had been seized by others, including the Polish state, cannot be expected to wait any longer."

In a position paper, the World Jewish Restitution Organization said, "Assets taken over or expropriated must be given back, otherwise the wrong committed is not redressed. The international community demands it. Morality requires it." It added, "Poland should attempt to have all private properties confiscated from 1939 to the end of the Communist regime restituted to their former owners or their heirs, even if many such properties are currently possessed by third parties."

Last week, the new executive vice-president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, Gregory Schneider, said that it will continue to work with the World Jewish Restitution Organization in Poland.

"It is a matter of basic justice that stolen property be returned," he said. "We are not seeking a designated amount. Rather, we seek justice."

Zvi Rav-Ner, Israel's ambassador to Poland, told The CJN that Israel has raised the issue.

"We are asking them to find a solution. It's a difficult, painful, complicated issue. We just hope they find a solution. Within 15 to 20 years, there won't be [Holocaust] survivors left to benefit from a restitution law."

Konstany Gebert – a Polish-Jewish journalist and director of the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture, an American-based organization that funds Jewish projects in Poland – warned that Poland will face an avalanche of lawsuits should action not be taken.

"Poland could be sued to the heavens," he said.

Three years ago, the New York Legal Assistance Group, a non-profit organization that provides free civil legal services to Holocaust survivors, threatened to file a claim against Poland in the European Court of Human Rights.

The claim would have been on behalf of French survivor Henryk Pikielny, who challenged Poland's refusal to give back his father's factory in Lodz.

Last year, Baroness Deech, a former British Broadcasting Corporation governor, hired lawyers in an attempt to force Poland to compensate her for properties that belonged to her maternal grandmother, who was murdered in a German concentration camp.

Polish officials realize that the issue is eroding Poland's image abroad.

"I wish it could have been settled already," said Ewa Junczyk-Ziomecka, secretary of state for community relations and social affairs in the chancellery of the president and Poland's soon to be consul general in New York City.

"Now there's a financial crisis," she added. "But finally it has to be done, as soon as possible. We don't need this. It makes both sides nervous. Our relations [with the Diaspora] could be hurt. I'm very worried about it. But I can't imagine that the government will pass restitution legislation in this economic crisis. I ask the Jewish community to be patient."

Maciej Kozlowski, Poland's former ambassador to Israel and currently its ambassador at large for Jewish relations, urged Jews to understand his country's difficulties.

Due to border changes since 1945, a number of properties claimed by Jews are now in Ukraine, Belarus and Germany, he explained in an interview. "To write a law that excludes such property would be very difficult."

In any event, he noted, Poland is in no position to pay full value for lost properties.

Kozlowski, whose family estate near Krakow was confiscated by the Communist regime, expressed pessimism that Jewish claimants can ever be satisfied. "If we give them 20 per cent of the value of a property, we'll be asked for 50 per cent. It's a legal nightmare,"

He has no idea when Poland will finally come clean. "No one knows when a law will be passed. It's a very complicated issue."

Halimi murderer gets life in prison, 14 gang members to be retried

JTA

PARIS — Fourteen of 27 gang members convicted of abetting the murder of Ilan Halimi will be retried.

Paris public prosecutors agreed to appeal the July 10 verdict against 14 members of a gang convicted of kidnapping Ilan Halimi and torturing the 23-year-old man to the point of death in 2006.

The announcement was made following the request on July 13 for an appeal by French Justice Minister Michele Alliot-Marie.

In line with Alliot-Marie's wishes, only those verdicts concerning gang members who received prison terms that were a few years shorter than recommended by the prosecutor will be appealed.

Gang leader Youssouf Fofana received the maximum punishment of life in prison and won't be retried.

The Halimi family and Jewish organizations have argued that the shorter prison terms did not match the severity of the crime, particularly since the French court ruled that the motive contained an anti-Semitic component.

Some 250 people gathered near the justice minister's office on July 13 in Paris in memory of Halimi, the French news agency AFP reported.

Fofana was sentenced to life in prison and 22 years without parole for organizing the gang kidnapping, torture and murder of Halimi.

Although Halimi family lawyer Francis Szpiner told French journalists he was "pleased" the Paris court had "recognized the anti-Semitic character of the crime," he and leaders of the French Jewish community criticized the lighter sentences given to fellow members of Fofana's gang, the Barbarians.

Szpiner said he regretted the court "showed a particular indulgence for those who aided and abetted Fofana in his crime," and he called on Alliot-Marie to appeal the verdict.

Two of Fofana's lieutenants who played particularly active roles in the 24-day torture of Halimi were sentenced to 15- and 18-year prison terms, respectively. The public prosecutor had asked for 20.

The young woman known as "Emma," who was used to lure Halimi to his attackers, was sentenced to nine years of jail time rather than 12. She was under 18 at the time of the crime and did not notify police during Halimi's three-week detention.

Of the 26 suspects who faced trial, which lasted two months, two gang members were acquitted and others received sentences ranging from six months to 18 years in prison.

The general prosecutor in the case told French journalists that the court's final decision was "fair."

At the verdict announcement, Fofana simulated applause, according to French reports.

The Jewish umbrella organization CRIF also criticized the court's decision, calling it "too lenient" toward Fofana's accomplices. CRIF also regretted that the trial was kept closed to journalists, a condition that "withdrew the exemplary and educational value that [the trial] should have had."

Halimi was found near death, naked and bound, by railroad tracks outside of Paris in February 2006.

Technion's special robot

Scientists at the Technion Institute of Technology have created a tiny robot able to crawl through a person's veins in order to diagnose and potentially treat artery blockage and cancer. The world's smallest robot, with a diameter of one millimetre, it's powered by an external magnetic field allowing it to be controlled for an unlimited amount of time during medical procedures.

'Nakba' reference excised

"Nakba," the Arabic term meaning "catastrophe" used to describe the creation of the State of Israel, will be removed from school textbooks. The announcement was made by Israel's Education Ministry. The term was approved for use in a textbook for Arab-Israeli schools in 2007. "After studying the matter with education experts, it was decided that the term nakba should be removed," Yisrael Twito, a spokesperson for Education Minister Gideon Sa'ar, told Ha'aretz. "It is inconceivable that in Israel we would talk about the establishment of the state as a catastrophe."

Dead Sea a finalist

The Dead Sea is one of 28 finalists in an international competition to name the seven natural wonders of the world. The announcement was made by the New 7 Wonders of Nature Foundation, which is organizing the competition. The Dead Sea will compete with other natural wonders such as the Amazon River, the Galapagos Islands, the Grand Canyon and the Maldives. Organizers expect more than 1 billion people to take part in online voting at www. new7wonders.com into 2011, when the finalists will be announced.

Security fence to stay

Israel won't be dismantling the West Bank security fence, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said. The Israeli leader called the fence "a critical component of Israel's security" and told the Knesset that it "will remain in place and will not be dismantled." Reports in the Israeli media indicated that the Palestinian Authority had relayed a demand to U.S. President Barack Obama that the fence be removed because the West Bank security situation had improved. Palestinian chief negotiator Saeb Erekat told Reuters he had approached the United States on the issue. "The Israelis know that the wall adds to the complexities," he said. "It's part of the problem and not part of the solution." Netanyahu told Knesset lawmakers that the fence should be credited with restoring security and preventing the entry of Palestinian suicide bombers into Israeli towns, and thus it should stay.

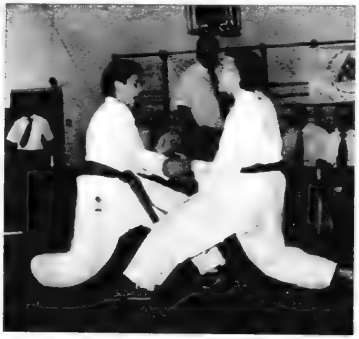
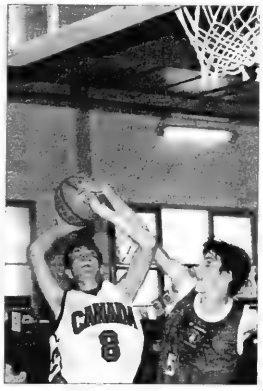
Maccabiah Games 2009





MEMORABLE MOMENTS

Led by the double gold medal performance of sprinter Nicole Gitlin, the Canadian Maccabi team won 63 medals at the recently concluded 18th Maccabiah Games in Israel. Gitlin, from Saskatoon, earned her two gold medals in the 100-metre and 200-metre track and field events. Her 11.83 time in the 100 metres was 8/100s off the Maccabi World Union record.

Canada, with 12 gold, 14 silver and 37 bronze, finished behind only Israel and the United States in the overall medal tally. The men's softball team cruised through the competition, compiling a 10-0 record en route to their gold medal. The junior girls soccer team had to work a little harder, defeating favoured Team USA for gold in a shootout after double overtime. The women's volleyball team, competing for the first time at the Maccabiah Games, won a bronze medal. The men's basketball team also won a bronze, despite playing the medal game with only six players, as three others were out due to injury.

Singing for kids is a thrill and a joy for Maggie G.

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

During her recent Father's Day concert at Dundas Square in Toronto, children's singer-songwriter Margot Glatt got kids into the summer spirit by getting them to play with imaginary beach balls, to the tune of her song Take Your Big Beach Ball.

"When you're doing a show, [kids] like to be involved," said Glatt, who goes by the stage name Maggie G. "You want to share that experience with them. It's not an intellectual experience – it's a shared fun experience."

Although Glatt grew up with a family who was heavily involved in the music business – her father was a promoter and her mother taught music to kids – she didn't get into writing children's music until after her first son was born.

Her big break came when a friend asked her to write the lyrics for the Safety Song for the Canada Safety Council's Elmer the Safety Elephant. From there, she ended up working on the mid-'90s TV series, Little Star, about a crew of six puppets who travel through space and time aboard the smiling spaceship, Mimosa. The series can still be seen in Belgium and South Africa.

Glatt, who cites Aretha Franklin, Chaka Khan and American folksinger Pete Seeger – whom she met when she was three years old – as her influences, released her first children's album, Around the House With Maggie G., in November 2008.

Glatt is excited about the newly released Picnic Playground, a collection of songs by the children's record label Putumayo Kids. Her song Let's Bake Cookies is the only one by a Canadian on the CD.

"I was ecstatic," Glatt said about getting her song on the recording. So ecstatic, in fact, that she made a music video for the song that you can view on YouTube.

Something else that excites Glatt is having the opportunity to make music for children.

"To be able to do it [create music] for kids is just really cool. I never actually thought I'd be up there on stage singing to kids, and it's totally a thrill and a joy."

Maggie G., then three years old, learns the basics from Pete Seeger.

Glatt did not see herself as a performer as she had stage fright when she was a child. At the age of 12, given the option to visit Israel or have a bat mitzvah, Glatt chose Israel because the thought of singing in front of a congregation terrified her.

While performing still makes her nervous, pretending that she is singing to her own children, Adrian and Morgan, helps to relieve the pressure, she said.

"[Kids] don't judge you for your vocal stylings. They are watching to see if you communicate with them. When you get up on a stage in front of kids, they already want to love you."

One of her greatest joys, performing and in everyday life, is making others happy. "Doing things that make people happy is definitely true of my character. If you can share your music and bring a smile, that's a wonderful feeling," Glatt said.

"Music is my comfort food. It's what I know, and it's what I love," she added.

You can listen to samples of Glatt's album and get more information on her website www.maggiemusic.com. To buy Picnic Playground, visit www.putumayokids.com.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN, PART TWO: MELECH GRAFSTEIN & SHOLOM ALEICHEM

It was just over a century ago, in 1908, that a young Jewish lad in Warsaw, Poland, had a brief personal encounter with Sholom Aleichem that he would remember for the rest of his life. Melech Grafstein, then a 15-year-old Bundist and Yiddish theatre devotee, had earlier seen him reading on stage and also davening in the local Chevra Shas Synagogue.

But it was another thing entirely when Aleichem came into the wine shop where Grafstein worked, and the young man excitedly whispered into his boss' ear the name of their important customer. As the proprietor sought out the rare wine that Aleichem had requested, Grafstein made bold to exchange a few words with him on the subject of literature. Paying for the wine, Aleichem asked that two more bottles be delivered to his hotel, and it was Grafstein who soon arrived at the Hotel Victoria, bottles in hand, hoping for another memorable encounter.

"When the hotel porter wanted to relieve me of my parcel, I refused to part with it, insisting on personal delivery," he would later write in a delightful reminiscence. "Sholom Aleichem was not in his room, but his wife received me very graciously. I refused the tip she offered me, saying that it was an honour and a pleasure to serve such a noble madam and the wife of such a great author. She answered this compliment with a charming smile. Although only 15, I played the role of a cavalier, bowing from the waist and kissing her hand."

A noteworthy postscript to this story occurred six years later, in 1914, when Aleichem visited Toronto and spoke at Massey Hall. Grafstein, who by then had joined some of his well-known family members here, attempted to greet him backstage and "found him resting in the dressing-room, worn out from his appearance before his enthusiastic audience. His wife was fluttering over him, holding a glass of warm milk in one hand and a white towel in the other, which she used to wipe the sweat from his forehead. I saw that both had aged greatly, and I did not have the heart to intrude. Not long after this, the immortal Jewish humorist left this world forever."

Like a good wine, Grafstein's adoration of Aleichem matured over the next four decades, a period in which he settled with his wife, Rose, in London, Ont., raised a large brood of children and became a successful textiles merchant. Always involved in a variety of Zionist and Yiddish cultural activities, Grafstein in the mid-1940s founded Farlag Melech Grafstein, an eponymous Jewish publishing house that produced a high-quality magazine, the Jewish Observer, as well as a superlative hagiographic tribute to the "Mark Twain of the Yiddish world" with a folio-sized and dazzlingly illustrated book titled Sholom Aleichem Panorama.

Appearing just over 60 years ago in 1948, the 415-page volume was clearly a labour of love on the part of its publisher, who devoted two years of life and spared no expense in its assembly. The table of contents extended over four pages and included essays and diverse reminiscences, translated stories and dramatic works, and an assortment of letters by and about its famous subject. The book even featured beautifully illustrated end-papers and a fancy ribbon bookmark.

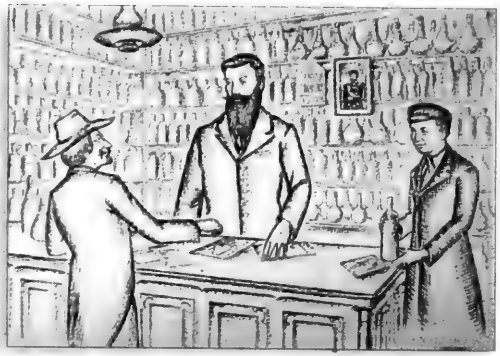
The contributors included such well-known figures as Itzik Manger, S. Niger, Maurice Samuel, David Rome, A.M. Klein and Aleichem's daughter, Lala Kaufman, as well as Grafstein himself. Isadore Goldstick, Grafstein's friend and colleague in London, Ont., and a well-known scholar and Jewish leader, provided many of the translations – so expertly that Schocken later anthologized them under separate cover. Illustrations, including dozens of likenesses of the pioneering Yiddish writer, came from Arthur Szyk, Lionel S. Reiss, Saul Raskin and other top Jewish artists, including several that had been commissioned exclusively for this volume.

An imprint of the publishing house Farlag Melech Grafstein (1948).

The book had a limited print run and used copies today are rare. Grafstein also produced a less lavish but no less glowing book on his alternate literary idol, Yiddish writer Y.L. Peretz, a volume that today is also exceedingly rare.

"London, not our great imperial city, but a small town in Ontario, Canada, has produced and sent out a Sholom Aleichem book that is really magnificent," noted the Jewish Chronicle of London England soon after the Panorama appeared. The reviewer added, however, that the volume was a bit too "over-rich" and "ostentatious" for his taste. But its high production values only reflected Grafstein's unbridled adoration of Aleichem and his sense, shared by many ardent Yiddishists, that no pedestal could be high enough for this patriarchal literary figure.

Besides its many fine attributes, the Sholom Aleichem Panorama accomplished two notable firsts. First, it brought renewed attention to Aleichem two decades before the Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof gilded the writer's reputation anew. Second, it contained an imperative early "In Memoriam" page to the six million who had only recently perished, urging readers to "remember what the Nazi-Amalek did to your people."



The late London, Ont. merchant and publisher Melech Grafstein, depicted at right at age 15, commissioned this illustration of his encounter with Yiddish writer Sholom Aleichem, left, in the wine shop in which he worked in Warsaw in 1908.

It must have been partly in response to the fresh European tragedy that Grafstein sought to remember the vibrant cultural life of his youth and give it a new, resplendent existence in a book – where it continues to shine even today. You will be well rewarded to request a copy of the Sholom Aleichem Panorama on your next visit to a major university or public library.

Correction

The article about Jeff Bien, "Poet makes the transition to singer" (CJN, July 9), contained several errors.

Although Bien did live in Montreal many years ago, he is a resident of Kemptville, Ont., a small community near Ottawa.

Also, Bien sang the songs on his new CD live several times prior to his doing so for the CD, and his Kaddish was inspired by French composer Maurice Ravel, whose version of Kaddish is the first of Deux Mélodies Hébraïques, composed by Ravel in the early 1900s.

Finally, Bien studied theology at university several years ago, but he is not now a theology student. The CJN apologizes for the errors.

Banding together for a cause

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Next Wednesday, veteran bandleaders from Toronto's simchah circuit will unite once more in an evening of song and dance, all to help child victims of terror in Israel.

The second annual Band-Tastic event will rock and roll over at Le Parc Conference and Banquet Centre in Thornhill (Aug. 5, 7 p.m., 8432 Leslie St.), with proceeds going to help send children from the besieged city of Sderot in the Negev to JNF summer and winter camps across Israel.

Last year's Band-Tastic event saw nearly 400 participants dance, sing and enjoy a festive mood created by the musicians and a silent auction.

The auction will be held again this year and tickets are now on sale for an "early bird" price of $60, Stephen Adler, a public relations co-ordinator for the event, told The CJN.

Participating band leaders – which this year include Saul Helman, Stan Hiltz, George St. Kitts, Rick Levine, Shelley Miller, Larry Rodness, Alan Shiner, Kenny Simon and Paul Zurionce – are all donating their time and energy, and they're looking forward to creating the same buzz that accompanied the inaugural Band-tastic gala last year at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Adler said.

Rodness told The CJN he's looking forward to his second go-around this year with Band-Tastic, after playing in the event last year.

"Last year's gig was more than I could hope for with respect to turn-out," he said, adding that getting the chance to play with his colleagues in the music business for a good cause was "fun" in and of itself.

"We all dredged up great memories. And the camaraderie translated to a great feeling on stage when we performed that night. The guests came expecting a unique event, and it was, both for them and for us."

He said rehearsals this year have taken on an extra tinge of excitement because there will be some new faces on stage and the musicians all feel more relaxed heading into Band-Tastic this year, now that they know what to expect.

For tickets, e-mail sheila.krone@jnf.ca, or call 416-638-7200, ext. 30.

Van Wilder director hungry to make his own movie

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Harvey Glazer wants to make his movie.

That's not to say his recent film Van Wilder: Freshman Year wasn't a fun and intense movie-making experience. It's just that the 35-year-old Toronto resident is hungry to create a work of art he can proudly call his own.

"I want to direct something that is 100 per cent mine," Glazer says. "And all criticism of that film will be something I'm accountable for, because I created it."

For the past few years of his nascent career as a filmmaker, Glazer has been tapped to helm third-party projects.

Van Wilder: Freshman Year, which went straight to DVD, is the third film in the Van Wilder franchise, which started in 2002 with Ryan Reynolds cast as the lead. Glazer directed Kickin' It Old Skool in 2006, produced by Bob Yari of Crash fame.

Harvey Glazer

But it's not as if Glazer is new to figuring out how to polish a prized gem. He's best known as a music-video director, with more than 108 music videos under his belt. If you've watched a music video by Canadian artists Classified, Jully Black or Choclair, you've likely seen Glazer's work. His company Twothreefivefilms is one of the leading firms for music-video production in Canada.

He points out the different approaches to tackling music videos and films. "Videos are all about style and esthetic, but in films you are closely working with people to bring out emotions," he says.

If Spike Jonze can smoothly transition from music-video director (Beastie Boys, Weezer) to film director (Being John Malkovich), why not a chirpy Jewish Canadian who grew up in Thornhill, Ont.?

Glazer has been involved in comedy films so far, a genre that requires a particular skill set. "For Van Wilder, I wanted to go back to the films I liked in the 1980s, such as Porky's. We gave it an old-school feel," he says, adding how references to classic comedies act as a homage to the films that inspired him.

Has Judaism affected his film career? "It's given me that trademark Jewish sense of humour," Glazer admits.

Speaking of Jewish humour, Glazer says he would love to work with Adam Sandler, but only if he could "take him back to his Billy Madison days." (Billy Madison is a 1995 comedy starring Sandler as a slacker who must go back to school in order to take over his father's company.)

Glazer says his life as a film director varies wildly from the quick shoots he did on music videos. Picture a year of your life dedicated to one project, one group of actors and production staff. "You eat, sleep and live on the movie you're working on," Glazer says. But he adds that the dedication makes the project substantial and meaningful, a goal that is more than just a notch in the belt. It's brush-stroked with every rewrite and reshoot the director wanted.

Glazer has begun the important phase of networking with key film personnel, whether they are contacts at TeleFilm or Hollywood producers. He says he's currently building his career path, and he only sees more intriguing work on the horizon.

And once he makes the film that's 100 per cent Harvey Glazer? "I hope people like the vision of what I set out to do," he says.

Holocaust literature and Yann Martel

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Some writers have all the fun. Yann Martel, whose Life of Pi won the Man Booker Prize and sold almost two million copies in paperback, has sold the followup for $3 million – the outcome of an auction managed by his Toronto-based agent, which was won by Spiegel & Grau, part of Random House.

Norman Ravin

The new book, according to Martel, will be an allegory of the Holocaust involving animals. Speaking to the New York Times from Saskatoon, Martel described his treatment of the Holocaust this way: "I was thinking that you don't have many imaginative takes on it like George Orwell's Animal Farm and its take on Stalinism." Citing Roberto Benigni's film Life Is Beautiful and Art Spiegelman's Maus as models, Martel pointed to what he sees as a lack of metaphorical treatments of the events of the war. Artists are, he feels, "fearful of letting the imagination loose on the Holocaust."

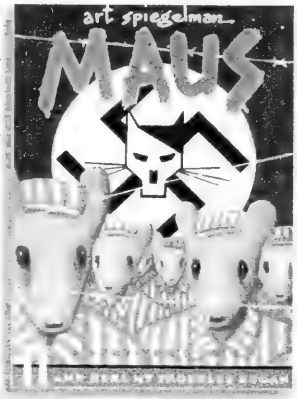
Life is Beautiful and Maus are two examples of "imaginative takes" on The Holocaust.

A lot can be said about such claims, even without Martel's as-yet untitled book at hand. In this case, the ephemera of an author's interview allows us to prepare for what will undoubtedly be a fresh literary juggernaut in the ongoing artistic response to the war. The first thing one can say is there have been influential allegorical "takes" on the Holocaust. They include early and successful responses, such as André Schwarz-Bart's The Last of the Just, which does not build its narrative around animals, but uses familiar motifs from folklore and legend and other kinds of phantasmagoric effect.

Unsuccessful allegorical efforts include Leslie Epstein's King of the Jews, whose imaginative response to the Lodz Ghetto's Mordecai Chaim Rumkowski styles itself after Hollywood slapstick movies, aiming to address the extremity of events with the elastic bodies and comic-book yawping of American popular culture. An even stranger and much more interesting book along these lines is Gordon Lish's Extravaganza, which is built upon Lish's version of the bitterly funny vaudeville act of a comic duo known as Smith and Dale. Running darkly behind their patter is an ever-growing awareness of the Holocaust's bleak outcome.

The foremost allegorical Holocaust novel is Aharon Appelfeld's Badenheim 1939, which appeared in English translation in 1980. A slim Kafkaesque parable, Badenheim presents a moment in time in a prewar central European spa town, and makes no mention of the oncoming war or the burden of Europe's Nazification, although it continuously points toward our knowledge of these things. It is true that Appelfeld's book is nearly unique in the Holocaust canon, yet it sits atop it, reflecting readers' (and writers') willingness to understand the events of the war by way of extended allegory or fable.

Martel's reference to the Maus books suggests either his own light reading of Spiegelman or a quality of ambiguity in Maus that begs misinterpretation. One doesn't think of Spiegelman's masterpiece as an allegorical text. Its use of mice, cats, pigs and other well-chosen animal faces for different nationalities is so ironic in its application that the effect is one of masterly caricature that constantly points to its own artifice. A remarkable example of this appears in a scene set in wartime Sosnowiecz, where, to masquerade as a non-Jew, the author's father ties a pig mask over his mouse face (what can this possibly mean, the reader wonders; what has changed in Vladek Spiegelman's demeanour to effect the charade?)



One must acknowledge, too, the graphic honesty of Spiegelman's portrayal of "mouse" corpses, piled as they were at the end of the war at Buchenwald and Bergen-Belsen. Quite unlike anything allegorical, and more direct than much literary and filmic representation of the war, these images are reminiscent of the atrocity story captured in newsreel footage of the camps. It's difficult to know what Martel could mean by social realist Holocaust art, but there is no question about the weight of historical detail in Maus.

Another source of allegory dealing with the Holocaust is a growing field of writing for children about the war. In this work such motifs as stars, trains, lost children and camps whose chimneys smoke darkly, day and night, are treated as suggestive objects that teach moral lessons to five- or eight-year-olds without showing them the actuality of German atrocity.

This latter feature – Holocaust history presented without violence – came up often in the reception of Benigni's Life Is Beautiful. Although my experience is anecdotal, I was often told by the film's viewers that they found it satisfying to see a film about the war "without the awfulness and violence." Regardless of what one felt about Benigni's film, there is, at least, the responsibility to consider the effect of such audience response.

What is the point of the kind of counterarguments offered above? In part they are cautionary. Sweeping claims that don't accurately reflect the state of the arts are inherently self-serving. They aid Martel in preparing the ground for his own effort, which should prove itself on its own literary terms; they reorder the landscape and assert a need for certain kinds of books that may not be as pressing as Martel says it is; they strive to reshuffle the canon – to place certain books at the peak and forget others. The average reader won't care about such things, but a careful reader of novels about the war should.

It may be less than fun to refuse a ticket aboard the yahoo express being prepared by Random House for the release of Martel's novel. Its supporters are already proclaiming its readiness to "become part of the canon of books about the Holocaust" that will "sell over time." The former issue – what gets into the canon – ought to be largely an audience-based decision. The latter hope – for sales eternal – reflects a publisher's pursuit of a title that will be reprinted in many languages over decades. Martel is not responsible for the way he is promoted, but his remarks from summery Saskatoon offered unguardedly when the Times came calling – reflect a lack of regard for the writerly effort, both great and failed, that came before him.

NCAA baseball beckons Toronto teens

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Maxx Tissenbaum and Steven Betcherman have a lot in common. Both are 18, both are recent high school graduates and both are moving up quickly in the world of baseball.

Tissenbaum seemed destined for the sport, as baseball practically runs in his family. His grandfather, father and mother were all ball players and, almost symbolically, Tissenbaum's first gift when he was born was a baseball glove he was small enough to sit in.

But what sealed the deal for the Toronto native was the film Back To Back, a documentary about the Blue Jays winning the World Series twice in a row in the early 1990s, which he would watch for hours on end as a kid.

It seems fitting, then, that Tissenbaum now has the chance to prove his mettle as a professional ball player with the team he admires most: the Toronto Blue Jays themselves.

Last month, the Jays picked five Canadian players in the last 10 rounds of the draft – Tissenbaum made it into the 43rd slot. He initially assumed he wasn't going to make the draft after not hearing from the Jays for several days, so when he received a call from scouting director Kevin Briand informing him he was one of the players they were planning on negotiating a contract with, he was ecstatic.

"I was jumping out of my shoes," he said. "I just looked over to my dad, because we were driving home from lunch at that point, and whispered to him so as not to sound too excited on the phone, 'Oh my God, I just got drafted by the Blue Jays!' and as soon as I got home I called half of the world to try to tell everybody to make sure I didn't miss anybody."

Maxx Tissenbaum

Tissenbaum just finished high school and is moving to Long Island to attend Stony Brook University, which has a NCAA Division 1 baseball team ranked in the top 50 and where he will study business management. Briand advised Tissenbaum and his fellow draft picks to spend the next few years honing their skills playing college baseball before going pro.

"They said, 'You all have good universities to go to – it's probably best to go to university right now and then deal with playing professional baseball three or four years down the road.' So they picked us sort of as a nod to our talent now, and if we have a terrific summer, like absolutely off the charts, they said they'd deal with trying to sign us then," he said.

Tissenbaum's parents were a major influence on his decision to focus on baseball, which began when he started playing for the North York Blues, a local team, more than a decade ago. He credits his father as the driving force behind his professional direction, and he recalls how the elder Tissenbaum would hone his son's skills through rigorous training routines after school in order to improve his game.

"My dad and I would stand out on our driveway for an hour and a half and he would just hit me 150 ground balls, back and forth and back and forth across our driveway till both of us were too tired to keep going. And then we decided it would be the same drill every single day," he said.

The six-foot-one-and-a-half, 200-pound shortstop currently plays for the Toronto Mets, an all-star city team in the Premier Baseball League of Ontario. He is optimistic about his chances of playing for the Jays at a future date.

"What everyone has said all along is that when you get drafted in high school, your chances only get better when you go to university, because you're playing against the next level talent pool… So, I think in the future it will probably happen again and hopefully, it'll be a little higher, a bigger chance next time," he said.

Like Tissenbaum, Team Ontario third baseman Steven Betcherman also has a long history in the sport, having been involved in organized baseball since he was six years old.

"I guess I always just loved the game," he said. "Even when I was a little kid, I'd always watch the Jays games… I played all those [other] sports when I was younger, but I always loved baseball."

Betcherman is enrolled at Rollins College in Florida, where he will begin classes next semester. It wasn't his first choice, however. He was planning to attend the University of Vermont, until the school eliminated its baseball program in February due to funding issues.

"It was shocking," Betcherman said of the university's decision, "because I'm all ready to go, and three months later, they have to cancel the program. That never really happens. But I was in touch with Rollins before, and after that I called them again and they had a spot for me, so everything worked out OK."

Betcherman is in his third year training with Team Ontario head coach Murray Marshall in sessions that take place three to four times a week, but he's expecting his regimen to get more intensive as he enters college.

He's also been doing quite a bit of travelling lately. The Toronto native returned to his hometown a few weeks ago after playing in Oklahoma with Team Ontario, and he's now back in the United States again, playing in Ohio and Texas before going off to school. He says he's made a lot of friends while playing for Team Ontario and appreciates being around people who share his enthusiasm for the sport.

"I'm really good friends with all the guys on my team, but of the ones from school, I'm pretty much the only one who plays serious baseball."

Although his throwing game is strong, batting is the area he says he still needs the most work in.

"Defensively, I feel I'm pretty good. That's probably the best part of my game. If I could just work on hitting for power, that would be great."

Betcherman is looking forward to continuing his studies in biology, his strongest subject, and is planning on majoring in sports medicine as a complement to his professional goals.

Canada wins gold, silver at Jewish hockey tournament

By STEVE SIMMONS
Special to The CJN

METULLA, ISRAEL — When the second World Jewish Hockey Tournament had come to an impressive end, players from three countries stood arm and arm on the ice, snapping pictures, exchanging hugs and jerseys, trying to make the experience last just a minute longer.

It was that kind of 10 days at the Canada Centre, emotional, passionate, a sporting and cultural adventure of a lifetime, with nine teams and five countries of hockey players a kick save away from the border of Lebanon.

As expected, the American and Canadian teams dominated the event, with each country coming away with gold medal victories. Team USA won the senior (over-18) division and Team Canada White, coached by former Maple Leafs' star Steve Thomas, running the table in the junior (17-and-under) division.

'You are what you eat': prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Like religious traditions, food plays a significant role in maintaining cultural bonds within a community, said Hersh Jacobs, a Ryerson University professor who teaches a course on the geography of food.

"The great Jewish philosopher Martin Buber talked about how people… belong to organizations and are in the business of differentiating themselves from different groups and creating a sense of bond and cohesion within a group. I just think that food is one way to achieve that goal," Jacobs said in an interview.

"We identify ourselves on the basis of the kinds of things we eat, and a lot of traditions, whether they are religious traditions or cultural traditions, in some way have some kinds of foods that are connected to certain holidays… Food is a way of expressing your identity and food says something about who you are individually, who you are collectively… and something about who you are geographically."

He said that an example of a religious tradition that focuses on food is the Passover seder.

Traditional Passover foods, such as matzah and bitter herbs, are typically eaten each year at a seder to symbolize certain aspects of the story about the Jewish Exodus from Egypt.

"It's not just purely a religious experience. It's more of a cultural and bonding experience," Jacobs said.

He said that food is also an important part of life-cycle events such as funerals and shivahs.

"In Jewish culture, people send food into the houses, and it is part of your acknowledgment and part of your connecting with the family and expressing your sorrow and support for the family," Jacobs said.

"For me, at least, it is often more enjoyable than food at other times. You feel guilty almost – maybe it's part of Jewish guilt – you feel guilty for enjoying food while you sit there, while you're lamenting the death of someone who is important to you."

He added that what people eat also says a lot about where a person comes from and who they are.

"Of course, you are what you eat… When you're going on a date or something like that for the first time, how you eat and what you eat says a lot about who you are and it tells you a lot about the person you're with," Jacobs said.

"People take enormous pride in the food they eat, and one way of readily offending an individual is to say something unkind, [such as] 'I think Italian food is disgusting… or Jewish food is designed to kill man.'"

He said that diets are relatively contemporary and geographical, meaning, that what we eat is "of this time and of this place."

That being said, foods continue to evolve and change as people move from one place to another and new ingredients are introduced to a community.

"When you think of Italian food, what are the cornerstones of Italian food? Tomato sauce, gnocchi, polenta. Polenta is like a cornmeal. Tomatoes – there were no tomatoes in Europe until [Christopher] Columbus. Tomatoes are a New World fruit. Until Columbus came, there was no tomato sauce. How do you even conceive of Italian food without tomato sauce?" Jacobs said.

"When you think of gnocchi, it was made with potatoes. There were no potatoes. They originated in the Andes. There was no polenta because corn again is a New World vegetable."

Just as Italian food has evolved to include New World ingredients and influences, so, too, has Jewish food.

"If diets change and evolve with the movement of people, with wars and conquests and the shifting of people from place to place, there are very few groups of people who have been more peripatetic than Jews in terms of their movement," Jacobs said.

"Jews from Russia come to western Europe, to North America… As Jews have gone from place to place, they have incorporated and adapted new ingredients and new techniques and recipes and they changed and incorporated what they could."

ORANGE-SCENTED COUSCOUS

2 c water
5- 6 tblsp orange juice, divided
1 tblsp olive oil
1 tsp finely grated orange peel
1 1/2 c couscous

Mix 2 c water, 2 tblsp juice, oil, and peel in medium saucepan; bring to boil. Stir in couscous; cover and remove from heat. Let stand until liquid is absorbed and couscous is tender, about 12 min. Fluff with fork, adding orange juice by tablespoonfuls to taste. Season with salt and pepper.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I met this new guy, Phil, and we've had three dates so far. He seems like a decent guy – good sense of humour, a gentleman, bright, dependable, adorable – but he has one major shtick: he's afraid of germs. How do I know? The other day we went out for dinner, and I ordered soup. It was so delicious that I wanted to share, so I filled up my spoon, blew on it a little, and, with my hand under the spoon, brought it to his mouth so he could taste it.

You'd think I was serving him spiders. He instinctively jerked back and said, "Let me taste it myself," and he used his own spoon to taste the soup.

I am seeing lots of little signs that indicate he has germ issues. He's also obsessed with using hand sanitizer – and here I thought he was the ultimate gentleman for not kissing me after three dates.

Do you think I should take a pass on this one? He's so cute and has a great personality.

Germ Squirm

Dear Germ Squirm

If you're serious about making it work with Phil, pull out the big guns and just ask. Tell him what your observations are, and give him some concrete examples of what you've observed. Give him the opportunity to explain if, in fact, it is just a "preference" to use his own spoon and hand sanitizer all the time, or if it's part or a bigger problem.

Germaphobia and/or OCD (obsessive compulsive disorder) are very real conditions that shouldn't be taken lightly. If this is a "shtick," as you call it, and not an actual underlying issue that plagues this guy, you need to know that. The only way to know is to communicate.

Many people carry around a little bottle of hand sanitizer these days and prefer not to share cutlery. We're bombarded with germ-warfare awareness every day – from the excessive reporting of swine flu to grocery aisles full of antibacterial products to hand sanitizer at every turn. Some supermarkets are now providing wipes for your shopping cart.

Germ busting has become part of everyday life.

As for Phil, perhaps he really is just being a gentleman by not kissing you yet. If you really like this guy, don't be shy and get the real facts.

How to be happy for no reason

So many of us look outside of ourselves to find true happiness. We think that finding the perfect career or relationship or achieving a goal will lead to the ultimate in finding our bliss.

But it actually goes even deeper than that says Marci Shimoff, who has written a magnificent book called Happy For No Reason: 7 Steps to Being Happy From the Inside Out. Naturally, I was intrigued by the title alone and wanted to understand more about this exciting premise, so I called Shimoff in California.

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

In her book, Shimoff intersperses comments from some of the world's leading experts in the fields of positive psychology with personal stories from more than 100 truly happy people. She offers up a seven-step program that will help you be happier right now, "no matter where you start."

What an inspiring concept – a way to help people find a deeper and more lasting happiness that doesn't depend on externals but is always available to you once you tap into the wellspring of happiness that resides inside of your being.

As one of the bestselling authors of Chicken Soup for the Woman's Soul and Chicken Soup for the Mother's Soul, Shimoff has her fingertips on the pulse of how to raise your "happiness set point" and gives us practical steps on how to practise being happier right now.

As she says, "Studies show that each of us has a happiness set point, a fixed range of happiness we tend to return to throughout our life that's approximately 50 per cent genetic and 50 per cent learned. In the same way you'd crank up the thermostat to get comfortable on a chilly day, you can actually raise your happiness set point!"

In Happy For No Reason, Shimoff gives us practical "how-to" strategies that will help us experience happiness from the inside out.

Some of the chapters include subjects such as taking "ownership of your happiness." She looks at how to find solutions instead of problems and how to find the gifts in life and make peace with yourself.

A beautiful section in the book deals with how not to believe everything your mind tells you, and how to let go of the negative thoughts that don't serve you. This chapter also looks at ways to "incline your mind toward joy."

How to "let love lead" and practise forgiveness, gratitude and loving-kindness and how to "make the cells of your body happy" are some other steps toward being happy for no reason, along with plugging yourself "into spirit" – by listening to your inner voice and trusting the universe to unfold as it should.

One of the most profound chapters is on how to live inspired by purpose and contribute to something greater than yourself. Another notable chapter is on how to cultivate nourishing relationships and how to surround yourself with such great support that you see the world as your family.

The 21 "habits" in the book are what make the difference, and Shimoff suggests you work on even one at a time, the one that resonates for you the most, and practise that for a few weeks.

"You will see your life transforming within a short period of time. You may want to find a happiness buddy. Tell them what your happiness habit of the week is and check in with each other. Just having your attention on raising your happiness level will make a difference and will create the lasting change that will lead you to the life of your dreams."

PILAROS TASTE OF THE DANFORTH
FRIDAY AUG. 7 — SUNDAY AUG. 9

ALL IN GREEKTOWN, YOURS TO ENJOY!

Discover A New "Taste" at Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth

Toronto's favourite festival offers fun for the whole family

Toronto's favourite street festival has a whole new way to celebrate the fun and flavours of Greece and summer in the city. Every year in August, the city of Toronto flocks to Greektown on the Danforth. Now celebrating its 16th year, the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth is Canada's largest street festival, welcoming approximately 1.3 million visitors. A Decima Research poll reported that 90% of respondents identified "The Taste" as their favourite GTA festival event — beating out such iconic events as the Toronto International Film Festival, Caribana and Pride Week.

Everyone gets to be Greek for the day

The GTA has more than 200,000 residents of Greek ancestry, the third largest Hellenic community outside of Greece, and between August 7th and August 9th, 2009, everyone who comes to the Danforth gets to be Greek for the day.

This year the Taste Of The Danforth welcomes a new Title Sponsor, Pilaros. Pilaros International Inc. is a leading importer of Mediterranean food products, primarily olives and olive oil — what the ancient Greeks referred to as "The Essence of Life".

This year's Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth has loads of fun, family-friendly activities for your entertainment and enjoyment. Here are a few of the programs, exhibitors and performers:

- The Celebrity Stage featuring "A Taste of Broadway", including The Sound of Music, THE JERSEY BOYS, Stage West's Breaking Up Is Hard To Do featuring the music of Neil Sedaka, and Second City;

- Kevin Brauch, hugely popular host of The Thirsty Traveler;
- The Greek Stage featuring traditional Greek dancers, singers and musicians;
- The Danforth Stage featuring an eclectic array of music and lifestyle-related programs and performances;
- The Sports Zone, including challenges created by Toronto's professional sports teams featuring the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Toronto Raptors, the Toronto Argonauts, and the Toronto Marlies. There will also be two volleyball courts (one for adults and one for children), and lots more chances for people to test their skills and win fun prizes;
- An Olympiada, offering fun-themed activities for the young, including a Mount Olympus Climbing Wall and a host of mini Olympic-style activities;
- A Mill Street Beer Garden and a Moosehead Beer Garden to help keep thirsty patrons refreshed, as well as a Mott's Clamato Caesar Garden and a Wine & Spirits Garden featuring sommeliers and a series of seminars on wines;
- And, of course, dozens and dozens of tasty sampling opportunities from the Danforth's amazing array of multi-ethnic cuisines.

On Friday afternoon, August 7th, as part of our "Pre-Show", celebrities, politicians, members of the media and corporations will be kicking up their heels with "Beds On Wheels" at the 5th Annual Danforth Dash Bed Race, in support of the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation. To date this event, which is hosted by the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth, has raised in excess of $100,000 towards the purchase of new electric hospital beds for TEGH. In addition to supporting The Danforth Dash, the Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth has donated upwards of $900,000 to Toronto East General Hospital.

We will also be welcoming The Toronto Police Precision Motorcycle Team, The Winged Wheels, in a special 20th anniversary performance.

Food, drink, entertainment, sports, games and much more

Our feature country this year for our new "Taste of the World" program is Japan. There will be Japanese karate and dance performers on our stages. Visitors to the festival will have an opportunity to win a Trip For Two to Japan, compliments of the Japan National Tourism Organization, Air Canada and Cerulean Tower Tokyu Hotel.

There will also be opportunities to win an Aegean Splendour Trip For Two To Glorious Greece, courtesy of Transat Holidays. This is a nine days/seven nights trip consisting of a four-night island cruise plus three nights in Athens, air transportation, 15 meals, transfer to cruise ship, transfer to hotel in Athens and transfer to airport.

With great food, great entertainment and great family fun, a splendid time is guaranteed for all at the 16th annual Pilaros Taste Of The Danforth.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Mezes the gold standard on Danforth

You can feel the positive energy as you approach the patio. You can hear the buzz as you enter. Your excitement builds as you're seated. Your taste buds dance with anticipation as you're handed a menu.

It's magic.

Most of the fine Greek restaurants on the Danforth will give you a pleasant dining experience. Mezes goes one step further by elevating even the most casual meal into a festive occasion. You'll experience such joie-de-vivre (the Greeks call it kharisma) that you'll find yourself wondering what special event you're celebrating.

Mezes makes every meal an event not by gimmickry or by song and dance, but simply by their approach to food. They treat it with such reverence that merely serving it is an occasion. And sharing isn't an option here, it's Plan A. The namesake, appetizer-sized mezes are meant to be ordered in multitudes and collectively enjoyed by the table. This communal style of dining — as authentically Greek as the gastronomy — isn't just sharing, it's a form of bonding.

"It makes for a convivial meal," says Mezes proprietor Sue Zindros. "It stimulates conversation, sharing good feelings as well as food, and it encourages people to try new things."

Most better restaurants now advertise their cuisine as "authentic" and "fresh from scratch", but Mezes has quietly been fulfilling both these mandates since Day 1. If anything, at Mezes these claims are understated.

Authentic and fresh enough for you?

Mezes pays top dollar for all their ingredients to ensure you enjoy the best of everything. But that added expense is not reflected in their prices.

"Our customers can taste the difference freshness and quality make. We believe in rewarding them for that, not penalizing them," says Sue.

The consistent excellence menu-wide makes it difficult to pick favourites here, so most customers start by ordering a large assortment of appetizers. They're all first-rate, but don't just fall back on old favourites like hummous and tzatziki; no visit to GreekTown is complete without sampling Mezes' Gigantes and Dolmades. When it comes time to order your entrée — if you can manage to get through the cornucopia of mezes — there's an equally compelling array of home-cooked meat, poultry, fish and vegetarian specialties to tempt your palate.

Mezes offers one of the most extensive Greek wine portfolios not just in Toronto, but nationwide, and can recommend the ideal accompaniment to your meal.

You'll find shades of copper in the decor and silverware on the table, but on your plate everything served at Mezes is pure gold.

Christina's authenticity has universal appeal

If one restaurant can be said to embody all the good qualities that GreekTown is known for, Christina's is that place.

Authentic Greek cuisine served in a festive ambience. A choice of dining indoors with elegance and intimacy, or outdoors on a convivial patio. And a bit of je-ne-sais-quoi — that intangible magnetism that makes celebrities and local Danforth-goers alike choose this restaurant over dozens of others at their disposal.

Christina's appeal stems from all of the aforementioned attributes, but food is always first and foremost in GreekTown. The term "authentic" is ubiquitous — you'll see it on almost every menu — but here it really carries weight, as those who've travelled to Greece will attest.

The fresh fish and seafood is a prime example. "Fresh catch of the day" heads the menu; it's what you'd typically be served in a Greek fishing village, and here is no different. Also popular are the Grilled fresh Atlantic salmon (brushed with herbs and spices) and Filet of sole (lightly pan fried with herbs and garlic).

As any Greek will tell you, "authenticity" means allowing the full flavour of the food to emerge, not smothering it in elaborate sauces to create the illusion of grandeur. With fresh fish that sometimes means "less is more", using exactly the right amount of herbs and seasoning for optimum taste — not a shake or sprig more.

The Lobster Tail broiled in garlic butter is a long-time favourite among the seafood entrées, but don't overlook the subtle synergy of tastes and textures in a Seafood Platter. For two, the Aegean brims with Shrimp, scallops, salmon and mussels sautéed in a tomato herb sauce; for several, the Mediterranean combines lobster tail, tiger shrimp, salmon, scallops, kalamari and mussels.

The meat entrées and vegetarian options are also first-rate, but don't expect to be confused by hundreds of choices. Christina's philosophy has always been to offer only as many specialties as they can prepare perfectly — a "Mother Knows Best" approach you'll find in any good Greek home. Or any good Jewish home, for that matter.

Live music and belly dancing on Friday and Saturday, an extensive wine list and the opportunity to host intimate private parties add to Christina's appeal. Partners Bill, Tony and Kathy are proud of their multiple awards, but the smile on your face is the trophy they covet most.

For Astoria, the future of Greek dining is now

If there's one word that's synonymous with "GreekTown On The Danforth", it's "Astoria." For well over 30 years, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Building on and enhancing the Astoria brand

Astoria's recent major renovation has seen it emerge brighter and roomier than ever, without losing any of its intimacy. If it shone before, now it positively sparkles. A nouveau rustic take on traditional Greek motifs unfurls in rich golds and maroons, with elegant tile underfoot and soaring sky blue overhead.

Company Director Peter Kerasiotis undertook the renovation with a view to embracing the needs and tastes of a new generation of diners while remaining mindful of Astoria's long-standing clientele. "Many of our original guests are still regulars three decades later," he notes. "They rely on us for their family outings and special occasions, and it's their loyalty that has allowed us to grow. We took our time renovating our original location and building our new location in Mississauga because we wanted to ensure a seamless transition. The idea was to build on and enhance the Astoria brand, not dilute it. That is something our customers would never have accepted. They expect satisfaction, and we intend to give it to them."

The feedback has been overwhelmingly positive, says Kerasiotis. The essentials — freshness, quality, and friendly personal service — are still unfailingly apparent at both locations. Astoria still imports staples such as feta cheese, olive oil and olives in small quantities directly from Greece. Their staggering portions still quell the most outrageous appetites.

Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. Judged "Best of the City" by Toronto Life and "Best of Toronto" by Now, Astoria's souvlaki helped make it a multiple winner of the Toronto Sun's Readers' Choice Award as Toronto's favourite Greek restaurant. Astoria was also rated "Best Greek International Restaurant" by Where.

Other jewels on the menu include hearty moussaka, exquisite grilled sea bass and salmon steaks — and Greek appetizers like grilled calamari and creamy homemade tzatziki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

"Best of the City"

Toronto Life

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location and dual outdoor patios (still the Danforth's largest, and now among its brightest as well!)

It's no accident that the first signs of an upcurve in the popularity of Greek cuisine coincided with Astoria's opening, nor is it coincidental that its continued growth in popularity parallels that of the Astoria we know today.

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to GreekTown" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Pan's charm no mystery: small place, big taste

Chris Christodoulou is not a master of feng shui, nor does his menu contain any Japanese influences. But the intimate enclave known as Pan On The Danforth shows such masterful use of space, you'd swear a feng shui master was behind it.

Blending many diverse elements into a harmonious whole, Pan glows with a rare charm. More has been accomplished here in less space than in perhaps any other restaurant in Toronto. Interleaved brickwork, gleaming hardwood floors, a cachet of curtains, nested wine rack and ensconced fireplace capped by an embossed copper ceiling merge seamlessly to form Toronto's coziest, most intimate dining environment. For Best Interior Designer of a Greek Restaurant, may we have the envelope, please?

"That's ridiculous," laughs Chris. "I'm just not smart enough to be either an engineer or an interior designer, so I have to do a bit of both." You can see the results in a series of excellent photographs and take a virtual tour at panonthedanforth.com.

A quaint dining environment is a big plus — as are live music and belly dancing Friday and Saturday — but it's the cuisine that makes or breaks a restaurant. Here, Pan shines. They don't just serve Mediterranean food; they bring it to life. And in order to encourage their always-steady traffic flow to continue unabated, they've introduced set dinner menus priced at $20, $25 and $30 to complement the regular menu.

Having spent most of their adult lives together in the restaurant business, the Christodoulous have seen it all and done it all. Chris chuckles at the so-called culinary "trends" that come and go. "There's no great mystery," he smiles. "You buy the freshest fish, meat, poultry and vegetables, then you cook them like every meal was your Mona Lisa. Like your life depended on it. Because in this business, it does!"

His customers understand. They know a great culinary masterpiece when they taste one. And they don't have to traipse through the Louvre to experience it.

Fish lovers drop anchor at Pantheon

Pantheon is not a fishing vessel, nor will you see chef Nick Paroussis casting a net over the counter or out the back door.

With the plethora of fresh fish served here, however, the analogy is not far-fetched. In 11 short years, Pantheon has distinguished itself as the premier destination for fresh fish and seafood, not only in GreekTown but Toronto-wide.

The popular favourites like Red snapper, Atlantic salmon and sea bass are here in abundance, but so are many other exotic selections you're unlikely to find elsewhere. Baby sea smelts and fresh anchovies are imported directly from Greece. Striped bass, orange roughy, black porgy, red mullet, sea smelts, and many others, impeccably prepared and seasoned, gratify the most discriminating fish lovers. At Pantheon, you could dine on a different fresh fish every day for a fortnight.

But selection alone does not a reputation make. Freshness is paramount and timing critical, particularly with fish and seafood. A minute too long on the grill or in the pan can detract from moistness, texture and taste. When he's cooking, Paroussis is locked in like Tiger Woods studying a championship putt.

Paroussis' partner John Troupis and his son Bobby Troupis understand that food is not merely sustenance, but art and soul. In that spirit, they do their utmost to ensure that each customer's visit is a sensory experience.

It's paid off. Pantheon has doubled in size since it opened and now offers two bright, spacious dining rooms. Semi-private dining with a comforting fireplace is available in the east room.

In a business where turnover is the norm, Pantheon's continuity stands out. The same head chef and most of the same wait staff present when it opened are still in place. People enjoy working here, they like the clientele, and the clientele likes them. Continuity fosters loyalty, and vice versa.

The Olympic Pantheon was blessed with the opportunity to taste the Ambrosia and Nectar of the Gods. The Olympics happen every four years, but at Pantheon, in the heart of GreekTown, you can indulge in those same taste sensations whenever the mood strikes you.

Mouthwatering homemade desserts, surprisingly low prices and the freshest fish this side of Greece. Our ship has come in.

Demetre's Desserts affirms pleasure over denial

If there's one person you love to hate, it's someone who can inhale the most luscious desserts on the planet — say, the kind served at Caffé Demetre — without gaining an ounce.

Themy and Alex, the owners of Demetre's, don't promise to transform you into that person. What they do promise is that the only "gain" your dessert will produce is a bigger smile.

"There's a difference between discipline and denial," says Themy. "We all have cravings. Indulging them is part of the enjoyment of life. Discipline is treating yourself to a freshly-made dessert in the right portion size. Denial is forcing yourself to do without it entirely."

What generally happens in the latter case, he says, is that people either (a) eat a low-fat or low-cal substitute, which fails to satisfy and only intensifies the craving, or (b) when the unreasonably-suppressed craving resurfaces, they grab the nearest chocolate bar or packaged nosh, with an aftermath of guilt and an aftertaste that's annoying and cloyingly sweet. Most of these packaged "goodies" are also full of chemicals. So much better and healthier to treat yourself to the real McCoy in the first place, he says.

"Your mom probably told you homemade is better, and she's right. This is homemade ice cream served in a café setting. Fresh. Not just fresh daily; fresh to order. We make our ice cream with state-of-the-art equipment. We use the finest ingredients money can buy. Our customers accept no substitutes. They want to feel treated, not cheated."

If you think Themy's merely singing for his supper, consider this. Someone who really does sing for her supper — Barbara Streisand — was so taken with Demetre's product that she sung its praises during a recent ACC concert. That's the kind of advertising money can't buy.

For hand-made ice cream that goes down as smoothly as a Streisand melody, this is clearly your destination. But Demetre's is much more than an ice cream parlour. Their crêpes and Belgian waffles are made according to the same exacting standards and with the same premium fresh ingredients, as are the sauces drizzled irresistibly over desserts too numerous to name. Bowls, cones, splits, sundaes, cake-and-ice-cream combos, one more mouthwatering than the next. The coffees — both conventional and specialty — are all top-drawer.

Despite Demetre's soaring popularity — off the charts since Streisand sang its praises — Themy and Alex are adamant about remaining well-grounded. "You're only as good as your last batch of ice cream," says Alex. "You can taste the difference quality makes, and we will not compromise that — ever."

Even Leaf fans wing it to Detroit Eatery

If you're a Leaf fan and the best burger in town is served at a Red Wing hangout, do you eat there?

Leaf fans — and fans of old-fashioned home cooking in general — have spoken. The answer is a resounding YES.

The incredible homemade burgers served up at Detroit Eatery have become the stuff of legend. The big chains should send their head honchos here to learn what a real burger tastes like.

These bountiful burgers would be much harder for a Leaf fan to appreciate if the proprietors were the rub-it-in type. But they're not.

On the contrary, Alex Antaris and his son Chris are endearingly humble and easy-going. When he's not serving, Alex can often be seen on the bench in front of the restaurant, holding court with customers, friends, and neighbours. His friendly banter is as much a part of the Detroit experience as wife Eva's delectable offerings that emerge, piping hot, from Detroit's busy kitchen.

If you're strictly old-school as far as your burgers are concerned, Detroit's your destination. The patties are individually handmade from the finest lean ground beef; no freezing, no pre-forming, no fillers.

The Antarises inherited the name Detroit when they bought the business in 1987. Chris, 18 and still involved in hockey at the time, took it upon himself to festoon the walls with Red Wing memorabilia. The rest is history.

And what history! Members of the Detroit Red Wings not only visit (Kris Draper's a regular), they also bring the Cup with them when they win it — which is often. Will the Leafs do likewise, if/when? Good thing the Antarises are in it for the long haul.

But hockey players aren't the only celebrities who do Detroit. On a given day you might see Jim Cuddy, Rick Mercer, Steve Paige, Gord Downey — or anyone who knows good home cooking when they taste it.

Detroit jumpstarts your day with a championship-worthy breakfast special that rivals the burgers in popularity. It's available all day long. Gargantuan sandwiches (steak, corn beef, roast beef and club) and steaming homemade soups hit the spot like a Gordie Howe slapshot. Old-school.

Open 8 am to 9 pm seven days a week and licensed, Detroit tames even the most ravenous appetites in an ambience so relaxed it's easy to forget you're in a restaurant.

There's not much more you can ask of an eatery.

Well, maybe one thing.

The next time Draper brings the Cup 'round for a visit, would you mind asking him if we can keep it for a year? We haven't seen it in ages.

Thuna Herbals' past a beacon for future

It's a delightful anachronism reminiscent of an old English apothecary shop. Fifteen hundred glass jars, each filled with a different herb or root, stacked high in orderly rows. The original creaking hardwood floor. And a proprietor who's all about knowledge and caring.

Established in 1888 (how's that for history?), this family business is now run by Evelyn Dorfman, the granddaughter of founder Dr. Max Harriman Thuna, and a staff of qualified herbalists on the original turn-of-the-century premises at 298 Danforth Avenue.

Over the years, the Thuna family has seen the use of herbal remedies — once the de facto method of treatment for most medical problems — lose ground to the synthetic drugs that have flooded the marketplace.

More recently, however, the pendulum has slowly but surely begun to swing back, as more and more people seek alternatives to mainstream medicine. Thuna's doesn't diagnose problems presented to them; rather, they advise customers seeking a diagnosis to obtain it from their medical practitioners. Some come with the blessing of their GP, but many are referred by naturopathic practitioners. Typically, clients come in on their own initiative.

Saul Pasen helped pioneer herbalism in Canada

THUNA HERBALS
298 Danforth Avenue
416-465-3366

Drawing on their schooling, Dorfman and staff choose from some 2,000 herbs, berries, roots, and leaves the precise combination most likely to alleviate an ailment presented to them. To cite but one example, a formula for bladder infection, or even interstitial cystitis, might include uva-ursi leaves, buchu leaves, parsley leaves, marshmallow root, corn silk, and goldenseal leaves.

Dr. Thuna and his children, including son-in-law Saul Pasen, pictured above, helped pioneer herbalism in Canada.

The current premises stand as a rich reminder of Canadian history. Even if you have only a passing interest in herbalism, you owe it to yourself to visit this Toronto landmark. And who knows — by asking a few questions, you might become further enlightened on this ancient practice.

521 more fun than a Fortune 500 company

If you're looking to chill out and chase the summer heat with a cool beverage that goes down smooth...

If you know exactly what an espresso or caffé latté should taste like, and won't settle for less...

And if you don't mind sharing it with a meshugenah who always seems to show up whenever you do—

Oops, sorry, that's the owner.

This guy is funny. If soul-soothing laughter is worth its weight in gold, then we should be paying double for our drinks. But we won't. We'll just kick back and let nature take its course. Which, at Café 521, means listening to Lambros Babatsikos weigh in on politics, business, sports, and any other subject he happens to be passionate about. Which is just about everything.

Behind the bluster, of course, resides plenty of seichl. Ditto for his much less ebullient but equally personable brother Frank.

Reared in their father's restaurant business since they were both knee-high to a grasshopper, the Babatsikos brothers opened Café 521 in 1999, transforming the corner of Danforth and Fenwick into a one-of-a kind L-shaped restaurant and bar. They have since renovated it twice. The most recent upgrade, courtesy of George Foussias of Hirschberg Design, has elevated the trendy spot to iconic status.

"Ohhhh, iconic," groans Lambros. "Now you're going to say that we're an icon like Saul Korman is an icon. Next thing you know he'll be in here measuring me for a suit!"

Tape measure or no, 521 definitely measures up. With digs like these in which to enjoy Toronto's finest scotches, martinis and specialty mixed beverages — as well as delicious light meals — their reputation continues to grow by leaps and bounds. Seating that's easy on the backside, prices that are gentle on the pocketbook, and friendly service certainly enhance their status as a favourite Danforth meeting spot.

521 is also a wonderful venue for private parties, with a variety of seating arrangements. The restaurant fronts two different streets, and its three sections (bar at front, dining area midway, private lounge at rear) are connected by three huge portals. The resulting depth perspective affords guests a telescopic view of the street.

There are no Fortune 500 companies on the Danforth, but through their enterprising manner and irrepressible good nature, the Babatsikos brothers are making this 500 number famous for better reasons: good food, good service and good cheer. And, needless to say, a better return on your enjoyment dollar.

Whether you're looking to enjoy a quick lunch or an after-dinner drink — or turn a relaxing dinner into a very relaxing evening — this hot spot gives you 521 reasons to chill out.

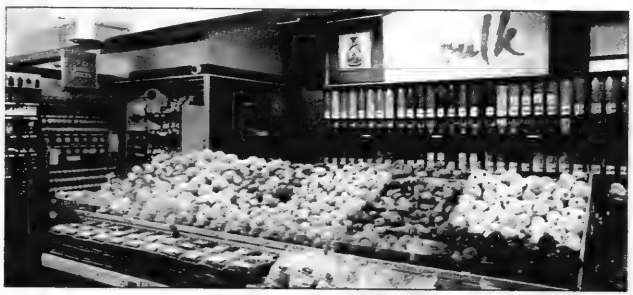
Big Carrot's loyal clientele embraces its ethos and products



If you have a favourite store that gives you great service, you tend to keep shopping there — especially when part of that service is the expert advice needed to make an informed purchase. The Big Carrot has become that destination store for an entire generation, and its customers have reciprocated with a level of loyalty unparalleled in the retail food business.

If you shop at The Big Carrot, you'll understand why it doesn't "feel" quite like any other store: it isn't. It's businesslike, but in no way "corporate"; the personal touch is ever-present. Because it's a worker-owned co-op, its members have an all-for-one and one-for-all attitude and never lose sight of the big picture: putting the customer first.

Ironically, in exemplifying the qualities typically associated with a small business, The Big Carrot has gotten bigger. Three separate expansions in the past 10 years have seen it almost double in space. Metropolitan Toronto's largest Canadian-owned purveyor of products for healthy living offers you much to enjoy.

The Big Carrot is really three stores in one: a health food store and market; a wholistic dispensary; and an organic juice, coffee and sandwich bar. It caters to a loyal clientele that embraces both its ethos and its products: minimally processed, organically grown, cruelty free, environmentally safe and, increasingly, non-GMO. Many of these products are also Kosher-certified.

Health-conscious customers seek out The Big Carrot for its extensive organic fruit and vegetable department (over 100 varieties at peak season) and its unmatched selection of organic bulk foods, dairy products, frozen foods, and packaged goods. Its extensive body care department boasts Canada's widest selection of personal care products for the entire family, including baby.

The Big Carrot's well-versed staff can help you decide which products will suit your dietary needs and your palate. If it's wheat-free — if it's dairy-free — if it's simply good for you, The Big Carrot has it.

For natural and organic pastas, breads, buns, bagels, flatbreads, cookies, muffins, and other wholesome nosherie, no other store — or bakery, for that matter — even comes close. There are literally dozens of choices here, many of them wheat-free, dairy-free, Kosher-certified — or a combination thereof. The Big Carrot has by far Toronto's largest selection of soy milks and other non-dairy beverages, both fresh and tetra pack.

Among many others, the Kosher-certified products include Crofter's Organic Premium Fruit Spreads from Ontario; Beit-Yitzhak jams from Israel; Sunflower Kitchen dips, pesto and soups; Imagine Foods Tetra Pack Dairy-Free Soups (the ultimate in convenience); Nature's Path Organic Cereals; Organic Meadow Yogurts & Pressed Cheese; Amy's soups, pizzas and frozen entrées; and an immense variety of chips and other snack foods such as Cocoa Camino Chocolate Bars.

One advantage of shopping here is that when you're thinking of buying a product you haven't tried before, you'll almost always find a staff member who's tried it and can give you an informed opinion.

A perfect example is the organic, Kosher-certified Italian Volcano lemon juice from Italy. Having tried various bottled lemon juice products before, we were skeptical. We'd never encountered one that measured up to freshly-squeezed lemon juice. But the produce manager not only used it and swore by it, he knew other customers who were likewise thrilled with it.

One sprinkling on a fresh avocado made us a believer. Try this and you'll only squeeze fresh lemons because you want to, not because you have to.

And that's just one product. The idea that dozens of others may be on The Big Carrot's shelves waiting for you to discover turns your shopping trip into a treasure hunt. It's easy to become hooked on the quality and health benefits of the products and the convivial ambience.

In the spacious, sunny body-care department, you'll get the same personal service and hands-on experience as in the grocery department.

The Big Carrot houses Toronto's only 100% organic juice bar. There are over 50 choices of juices, blender drinks, nutritional boosts, shakes, and fair-trade organic coffees, as well as sandwiches and other treats. The Deli counter offers more than 50 mouthwatering selections, both hot and cold.

The Big Carrot has remained the leader in an increasingly crowded field by offering products that are as good for the environment as they are for its customers, and by offering a level of expertise and personal service unmatched in the industry. It also demonstrates its environmental friendliness by heating its juice bar entirely from solar panels.

Through its ongoing expansion, The Big Carrot has retained the humility and friendliness of its early years. This is a store that's down to earth in every possible sense, and a real pleasure to visit. It's an oasis of calm amid the chaos of everyday life. A visit here isn't just grocery, supplement and cosmetics shopping; it's a balm to the spirit.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

At MR. GREEK, great taste and good health go hand in hand

The name "MR. GREEK" has become synonymous with excellence in Mediterranean cuisine. In growing the brand from the original Danforth restaurant in 1988 to 25 locations today, MR. GREEK has played a leading role in popularizing this culinary genre throughout the GTA and beyond.

In growing the brand, however, MR. GREEK has remained faithful to the quality and hospitality of its beginnings. "Expansion does not mean dilution," says President George Raios. On the contrary, he notes, that fact that each franchise adheres to a set of strict standards is their customers' assurance of an exceptional dining experience at any MR. GREEK location or MR. GREEK catered event.

Growing the brand while remaining true to its roots

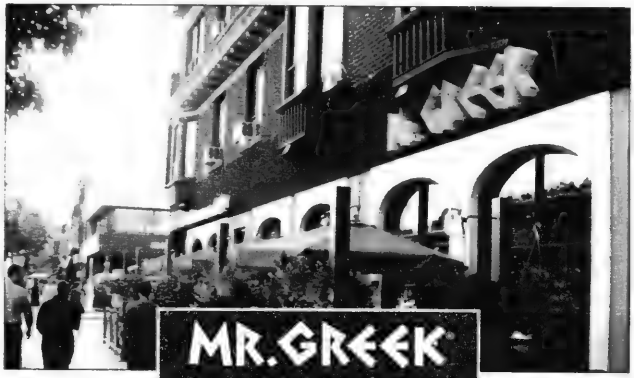
How you're greeted is one of those standards, adds Raios. "We're not just inviting you into our restaurant, we're welcoming you into our home. A warm reception is not a suggestion — it's a requirement."

In perusing the menu you'll discover that MR. GREEK's pioneering spirit extends beyond the dining area into the kitchen.

Some who equate Greek cuisine with souvlaki, rice and potatoes have come to think of it as "heavy". It's a limiting vision that MR. GREEK set out to dispel in late 2006 at both the perceptual and culinary levels.

Not content with a menu that had already won awards, MR. GREEK hired professional food consultant Rosie Maclean to refine its recipes with a view to reducing overall sodium and fat. The result is a presentation of nutritionally balanced meals without compromising taste, authenticity or quality.



526 Danforth Avenue • 416-461-3434

Never one for half measures, Raios further underscored MR. GREEK's commitment to a healthy lifestyle by posting the nutritional content of MR. GREEK's dishes on the company's website. Included with this analysis is a scientific explanation of the health benefits of olive oil, a staple in Mediterranean cuisine. All the oils used at MR. GREEK are trans-fat free.

Upgrading an already-healthy menu and supplying relevant information on nutritional content was an easy decision, says Raios. "We believe in full transparency, and talk is cheap. In order to change perception long-term, you have to change reality."

Old-fashioned, healthy home cooking has always been a core concept for Greek restaurants, he says. "We wanted to ensure that in our case, the "healthy" part of the equation was supported with facts. Our customers can enjoy any item on our menu in the knowledge that at MR. GREEK, great taste and good health go hand in hand."

Your Greek experience might begin with a freshly tossed Greek Salad, dressed with MR. GREEK's signature vinaigrette — a tempting combination of fresh tomato, cucumbers, kalamata olives, feta cheese and romaine. Among the main courses, you'll find MR. GREEK's expertly grilled souvlaki deserving of its reputation as 'Canada's favourite'. Moussaka is carefully prepared with a traditional recipe that would make any Bubie proud. The Taverna Chicken is magnificently moist with sealed-in juices. Lamb "Arnaki" Fournou — lamb shoulder slow roasted in its own juices — is so tender you won't even need to use a knife.

Supporting the healthy home cooking perception with facts

MR. GREEK's mission statement, 'Because life has to be enjoyed', is more than an advertising slogan, says Raios. "Being part of our team means living up to that affirmation by ensuring that every customer enjoys their visit to the fullest. We guarantee it."

What gives him the most pleasure, he says, is enabling increasing numbers of people to discover the joys of Mediterranean cuisine. "Everyone deserves the experience of dining in a Greek home. Growing the brand is not just about opening more stores, it's about sharing that experience with as many people as possible."

"Today, everybody's running. Here you don't run. You enjoy."

If an edgy, fast-paced, noisy environment is your idea of a good time, this restaurant is not for you.

If, however, you like to enjoy your meal slowly, peacefully, one luxurious bite at a time — in complete comfort — no other restaurant does it like The Palace.

Delicious food and gracious service are the cornerstones of Greek dining, and nowhere are these qualities better exemplified than at the Palace. It bridges the gap between conventional fine dining and mainstream Greek cuisine. The traditional Greek dishes like souvlaki and moussaka are first-rate, as are the many choices of fresh fish and seafood. But if you're in the mood for steak, the Palace does it as well as any steak house and better than most.

On the ground floor, the main dining area is split into two levels. On the second floor, a sprawling party room awash in natural light accommodates up to 150 guests in complete privacy. For birthday parties, anniversaries, corporate functions and large office luncheons, it's a refreshing departure from cookie-cutter banquet halls.

On both levels, the tables are elegantly set with fine linens. The service is prompt, but never rushed. There's a quiet grace and easy pace to the proceedings that evoke the familial gentility of a bygone era — a quality brought to light in the recently-published Our Danforth, in which

The seating arrangements ooze comfort. Says Hadjis, "You need elbow room in order to digest properly and enjoy the food. Today, everybody's busy — running, running all day long. Here you don't run. You sit and relax. You enjoy."

To that end, Hadjis, wife Stella, son John and staff provide the kind of service that comes only from the heart. The kind that has built relationships lasting not just for years, but for generations.

True to its name, the Palace really does treat you royally. The red carpet rolled out on Day One hasn't been rolled back since.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Historical flavours come alive at Messini

When visiting most websites, you're tempted to "Skip Intro" as prompted. You want to get to the heart of the matter ASAP.

Visit Messini's website, however, and you'll find yourself engrossed in the historical introduction; at Messini, history is at the heart of the matter.

A sequence of richly-textured, sepia-toned photographs of the southern Greek village of Messini, circa 1930, set the historical stage for the taste treat you'll experience at 445 Danforth.

After 23 years of restauranteuring in Europe, owner Marinos Dafnas opened Messini with the singular goal of elevating gyros preparation to the lofty level it enjoys in Greece. If you know gyros only as meat on a pita, Messini will open your eyes — and your taste buds — to an exciting new dining experience.

So how does the Messini version of gyros rise above the rest?

- Meticulous preparation. Roasted to perfection on a spit, the gyros (pronounced yee'-ros, from Modern Green guros, "turning") combines the finest marinated cuts of moist and dry meat to ensure that it retains its juiciness and tenderness throughout the cooking process. Unlike your typical fast-food gyros, Messini's are prepared fresh from scratch: no freezing, no precooking;
- Quality and freshness of trimmings. The tzatziki, red onions, parsely, spices, and French fries (as per Greek tradition), like the meat, are all up-to-the-minute fresh;
- Pita made fresh daily on the premises. As with any fresh homemade bread vs. mass-produced, there's simply no comparison.
- Variety. Messini caters to a wide range of palates and dietary preferences by offering chicken and vegetarian gyros in addition to the traditional meat.

MESSINI AUTHENTIC GYROS

The result: a whole that's greater than the sum of its parts — a sandwich that melts in your mouth with a rich blend of subtly interwoven flavours.

The prices are more than reasonable, with gyros dinner entrées starting from $8.25, lunch specials from $6.50. The menu also includes mainstream Greek selections, but you'll do yourself a disservice if you don't at least try the gyros.

Messini's immaculate interior flanks an open kitchen. Pleasant brown and cream tones — gleaming ceramic tile floor, rich wood trim and comfortable seating — create an aura of casual dining elegance.

The beaches of Peloponessos may seem far away, but at Messini, some of southern Greece's best tradition and culture is right here for the sampling.

"What do you think this is, a restaurant?"

One of the things we love about GreekTown is that you can't go more than 10 feet without someone wanting to feed you.

If that reminds you of your home and a certain person in that home, then going to Zorba's for dinner may feel like walking from your living room into the kitchen — with one important difference. At Zorba's, that "certain person" isn't Mom, it's Dad.

681 Danforth Ave. at Pape
416-406-1212

"Dad" — owner and chef Kosta Carasoulos — cooks whatever he feels like cooking; what he puts on the table is what you get. (As some mothers might say, "What do you think this is, a restaurant?").

Fortunately for his customers, what Carasoulos "feels like cooking" isn't one or two dishes but 10 to 20, and the "table" he puts it on is a steam table. You choose what you're in the mood for and are generously served by one of seven or eight Carasoulos family members. "We have an informal family reunion here every day," jokes son Bobby.

They have menus here if you insist on à la carte, but unless you're ordering a fresh salad, a shish kebob or hamburgers and french fries for the kids, you can do just as well without them.

On any given day, you might enjoy moussaka, pastitsio, lamb shank, lamb fricassee, roast chicken, roast potatoes, green beans with zucchini, carrots, or cauliflower, soup, and a variety of other specialties. This is as homemade as it gets. You can call ahead to see what's available, but most people don't — they just show up with an appetite and a smile.

Having each dish on piping hot display makes deciding what you want a lot easier; taste buds respond better to immediate stimuli than to menu suggestion. In that respect Zorba's katsarola (Greek for "pot", a metaphor for home cooking) is much like a holiday dinner that your Mom has slaved over. It's a labour of love that sees all your old favourites materialize before your eyes.

That's the good news. The bad news is that once these haymishe specialties are gone, they're gone, and with an eager clientele weaned on home cooking, it's best to arrive early for best selection.

The service is warm and courteous, but there are no grand formalities here — just the familial ease and grace of people who, like an old friend who never changes, are always easy to be with.

The prices are so low they're almost guilt-inducing; rarely will you enjoy so much food for so little. That may explain why during the week, the take-out lineup sometimes rivals the sit-down crowd. You just can't cook at home for less.

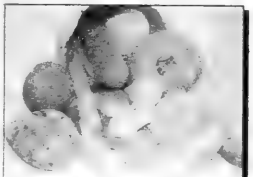
Eating here will, however, rekindle all your good memories of home cooking and of a simpler time and place in life that most of us would dearly love to get back to, if only for an evening.

Here, you can.

Select Bakery brings the past rushing back

Walking into Select Bakery is like taking a step back in time. Your childhood forays into the local bakery — and the irresistible urge to eat everything in sight — come rushing back.

This is noshing heaven on a grand scale. Huge (5,000 sq. ft.) yet intimate (GreekTown's only bakery with a dedicated seating area), the majestic array of baked bounty is the gustatory equivalent of surround sound.



It's kid-in-a-candy-store syndrome, but better. You get to set adult limits on how many fresh-daily delectables to ingest — then disregard those limits as your resolve crumbles faster than a sheet of phyllo pastry.

Enhancing Select's seductiveness is the colour scheme (tan on caramel on chocolate) and a refinement of presentation worthy of the illustrious cafés of Europe after which it's modelled.

The Katsamakis family — father Emmanuel, sons Kosta and Nick, and daughter Areti — lead a cheery staff of skilled bakers and pastry chefs. A full range of traditional Greek, European and continental pastries (baklava, galaktobourako, petits fours et al) is complemented by exceptional European breads, specialty cakes of the highest order, and sublime specialty coffees.

For weddings and other events, Select's special occasion cakes score a 10 on 10 for artistic merit. Your input is welcome in the design process, though doing so feels a bit like advising Michelangelo on sculpting techniques.

Further distinguishing Select are its prepared foods. Moussaka, pastitsio, and many other entrées — plus the full gamut of Greek dips and sauces — are made fresh daily. Many entrées are available fresh or frozen, and most are suitable for freezing. Need to entertain on short notice? Select is a one-stop destination for party trays, rolls, and related comestibles. And its ultraconvenient location on Donlands just south of O'Connor has ample, inexpensive meter parking at the front door.

No visit to Select is complete without these signature goodies:

- European Village Bread: crusty on the outside, buttery soft on the inside;
- Kalamata Olive Bread: The standard by with others are measured. Buy two;
- Chocolate-covered Baklava: a hybrid pioneered by Select, it picks up where "to die for" leaves off. Don't say we didn't warn you;
- Mille Feuille: Select's version makes a good run at the proverbial thousand sheets, each one shatteringly good.

Bakeries are the stuff of childhood longing; each is measured against our favourites of yesteryear. This bakery belongs in that Select group. Entering its time warp is deliciously easy; leaving is the hard part.

Ouzeri: Danforth's most relaxed dining

A splash of vibrant colour, sweeping sky-blue awnings, and a festive patio beckon you inside. It's as if you stepped straight off the sidewalk onto the beach. Ouzeri has the unique ability to relax you in seconds — a valuable asset when you consider that the enjoyment of any meal hinges first and foremost on the absence of stress. This is the one GreekTown restaurant that feels like one giant patio. Even when you're seated inside, the open, airy ambience gives you a sense of freedom, of letting go.

500A Danforth Ave. 416.778.0500

Like their pride and joy, brothers Chris and Alex Trahiotis are bright, cheery, welcoming people whose love of the restaurant business comes naturally, since they grew up in the business.

Marrying European fine dining with Greek cuisine, Ouzeri's eclectic menu is focused on quality, not volume. The kind of quality that will stir your fondest memories of home cooking. Sacrilegious though it sounds, Ouzeri's Avgolemono Soup will have you drawing favourable comparisons with your Bubie's chicken soup — high praise indeed.

Famed for their appetizers, Ouzeri also offers a number of intriguing entrées. Strydia Ouzeri is topped with spinach, tomato, kaseri cheese and Ouzeri's special sauce, then baked to perfection. Lamb rosemary pie, offered in your choice of lamb shank and feta or chicken with a rosemary and mushroom sauce enveloped in filo, is warmly recommended. The moussaka — both meat and vegetarian — is as good as it gets in GreekTown, and the seafood richly deserves the "authentically Greek" label you'll encounter everywhere on the Danforth. Fresh fish is available daily, and may feature Red Snapper, Sea Bass, Salmon, or whatever catch happens to be freshest on the day you visit.

Ouzeri's extensive Greek wine list has a selection that will perfectly complement any of the entrées, or stand on its own as an after-work or after-dinner libation.

The service is friendly and extremely thorough, with ample wait staff to keep pace with your needs. Like the awnings, they're dressed in an extremely comforting shade of blue.

Whether you're looking for a quick bite or a long, pleasurable meal, Ouzeri's three levels of dining all convey the same gentle message: Relax. Relax. Relax.

"One of my favourite summer patios" — Saul Korman

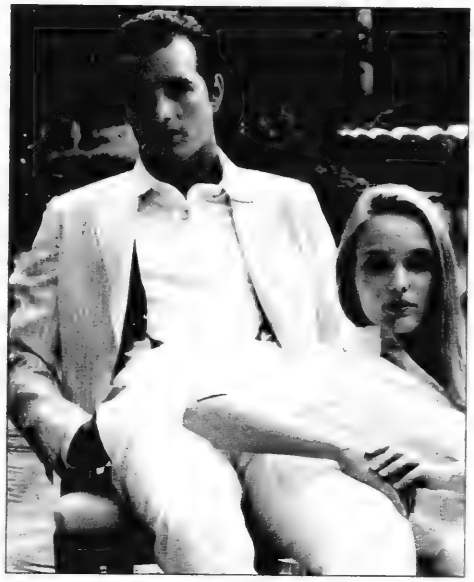
If the suits fits, chances are you bought it at 569 Da



Someone needs to tell Saul Korman that you don't need to run 60 laps to establish a track record.

With each passing year in business — now 59 going on 60 — and with each suit sold, Canada's quintessential independent menswear store writes a new chapter in Canadian retailing history. His store may not be the oldest. It may not be the largest. But it is arguably the youngest in spirit of a handful of old-school, owner-operated menswear shops, and was considered of sufficient historical importance to warrant its own chapter in the recently-published Our Danforth. As he steams into his seventh decade on the Danforth, the author isn't ready to turn the page just yet.

If we can't call it a marathon, can we say that if you laid all the suits you've sold end to end, they'd stretch from here to Athens?

That's a stretch even for the master of hype. "Maybe from here to Beth Emeth," he chuckles.

You'd be hard-pressed to find a working man on the planet who derives more pleasure from his daily breadwinning. The shmata business he's known and loved for 60 years isn't just a livelihood; it is, to borrow a phrase from A. M. Klein, "life and breath to him". And so he marches on, year in, year out. Where did 59 years go? "In the time it takes to cuff a pant", sighs Korman. "It seems like yesterday my father was hanging up his shingle."

Time goes fast when you're having fun.

Korman's gait has slowed considerably due to a double knee replacement and other physical challenges, but he soldiers on. The almost evangelical fervour with which he embraces the menswear trade hasn't abated one iota. Customer service is a religion; woe betide the employee who leaves a client unattended for a nanosecond. Ask any salesperson who's done it and they'll tell you how much Korman has "mellowed".

"If a house "shows well", maybe we should too."

"The customer is not here to wait on us," intones Korman. "We're here to wait on him."

Nor has his passion for fashion diminished. "Every man deserves the pleasure of looking like a mensch — whether they buy from me or someone else," he says. "Looking like a million bucks is better than winning a million."

But if we do win a million, can we still spend it at Korry's?

"If you insist."

Our sartorial orator continues. "Look at any real estate ad. They always say the house "shows well." We need to show well too. If we don't, who's going to buy what we're selling? There are so many things in life we can't control. The one thing we can control is how we present ourselves."

Those who renounce the "look good, feel good" paradigm are in denial, suggests Korman. "When you just throw something on, it shows. It tells whoever you meet on that day that you didn't care enough to make an impression. That they just didn't matter enough to you. If you don't believe that, try looking like a schlep at your next meeting or on your next date and see how well you're received. I couldn't even get away with it at home — Myrna would throw me out."

If man's basic needs are food, clothing and shelter, Korman has two of them covered. "We do the clothing. My neighbours look after the food."

So they do — with a little help from Korman. He's almost as well-versed in menus as in mending, and his personal recommendation to a restaurant carries clout. Friendly service is a given on the Danforth, but greet your host with "Korry's sent us" and watch him or her light up like a beacon.

nto Korry's and ask.

And if you do buy a suit? Can't hurt.

Having selected a good spot to indulge your taste buds and display your new threads, what will you be wearing?

The skinny, says Korman's son and right-hand man Michael, is that "thin is in." In suits, jackets, shirt and pants, tapering and snug fitting are back, a trend fuelled no doubt by the growing preoccupation with health and fitness. Loose fits have given way to streamlining.

Does that mean the suit fits now, but won't after lunch? Saul said it himself: "You won't go hungry here."

You don't have to be a will-of-the-wisp to get the right fit, says Michael. "It's a trend, not a sea change. We still fit all sizes, and if we don't have yours in ready to wear, we'll custom tailor it. Tapering just lends itself to a clean, crisp look, and gives you added incentive to stay in shape."

RY'S

ys.com

Korry's has expanded their collection of accessories with a view to achieving a complete look in house. Belts (some designed by Michael), cufflinks, and shoes are all part of the mensch-making process, and of course there's an incredible selection of ties. One snappy number occupies its own shelf: a blue-on-blue diagonal stripe that is the official symbol of — and a revenue generator for — Prostate Cancer Canada. As a prostate cancer survivor, Saul Korman is proud to be one of a select group of retailers to sell it.

Picking the right tie, says Michael, "is not an afterthought, it's an art. It's the focal point of your overall look. A great tie doesn't salvage a bad suit, but a bad tie can really downgrade a good suit."

And if your better half dismisses your choice of neckwear with "Guys can't pick ties", she might be right, says Saul. "It's true; unless you sell menswear, your wife can probably pick a better tie than you can. So swallow your pride and listen."

The women who rate your appearance also know where to get their own suits custom tailored; luxurious pure wool fabrications know no gender barriers. "It's not something we actively promote, but many of our customers' wives take advantage of it. They see our attention to detail and the quality of fabrics we use, and want the same for themselves. We're happy to accommodate them," says Michael.

Insofar as colours are concerned, black and blue are still the frontrunners in the Boss, Canali, and Pal Zileri collections. Charcoal and chocolate brown have come on strong, however, both in solids and stripes.

Though Korry's carries top-drawer merchandise, versatility and enduring value are still prioritized over exclusivity. "Most of us can't afford to constantly renew our wardrobe," says Michael. "But we can still stay up to date with garments that carry well from season to season."

"Our Roberto label has the kind of value that allows you to do this," interjects Saul. "When we introduced it 18 years ago with the two for one concept, it created the perception of value. We then validated that perception with quality. Our two for one sales have never been better. And we make every Roberto suit, shirt and jacket right here in Canada. Our garment industry has a tradition of quality established by our parents and grandparents and we will not abandon that tradition."

True enough. Few are the Jewish families in Toronto today who aren't in some way, going back a generation or two, connected to the garment trade.

"The real legacy is working with good people"

The menswear business may have given Korman a podium, but he uses it to plug far more than shmatas. His annual golf tournament, held both this year and last at Angus Glen, raises funds for the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation, of which he is a Board member. He champions the annual Taste Of The Danforth, which also raises money for charity, like no other merchant. He promotes it relentlessly on his dime. Whatever's happening in GreekTown, you'll likely hear about it from Korman before any media outlet. His live, off-the-cuff radio spots are as much a part of his legacy as the cuffs on his three-for-one shirts.

Buttressing Korman's legacy are many prestigious awards and accolades, including the Fashion North Retailer Of The Year Award in 2007 and a Lifetime Achievement Award from MR in 2008.

The real legacy, however, is "living and working with good people. First, there's my family who puts up with me. Then there's my customers, my staff, my neighbours and friends on the street, my friends in the trade. I can't wait to turn the key in the morning. Who wants to retire? From this? From my people?"

The truth is, he can't.

He's having too much fun.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Eighth wonder of the fashion world

If your fashion shopping brings you to Eight, you've definitely arrived. The fashions are hot, the music is hip, the service warm and personal. Using a formula that's 20 parts Queen Street urban chic, 40 parts Bloor Street style and 100 parts fashion flair — at très friendly prices — Eight flat-out rocks.

541 Danforth Ave. 416•461•5339

Can a store be stroller-friendly, yet still cater to a mature crowd? Eight does. Here, women and men of all ages coexist and co-shop not just peacefully, but gleefully. Seven short years after Eight's touchdown in GreekTown, fashion shoppers city-wide continue to feel its vibe.

Part of Eight's special energy emanates from owner Karin Kassabian, whose expertise and unassuming approach resonates with customers. "We operate on a 100 percent comfort zone, not 99 percent," she says.

This comfort level extends to fitting, where K's keen eyes ensure that you'll look great in whatever garment you try on — or it won't leave the shop with you.

Eight is particularly popular among women in the 25-50 age group, though everyone from16 to 66 feels at home here. Eight's target market is "anyone who wants to look good and feel good," says K.

Though Eight carries loads of hip denim, it's much more than a jeans store. From mainstream styles to beyond-the-edge, Eight carries the later-than-latest in casual clothing from Italy, Amsterdam and other European fashion hotbeds, as well as hand-picked domestic fashions from promising new designers like Mark Foreman.

Because Kassabian's buying is intensely personal — "I wear what I sell" — you won't find Eight's pieces all over town. This suits K and her clientele just fine. "My taste may take me out on a limb, but lots of people have climbed onto that limb with me."

K buys with a view not only to style but also to transitional value. "If you really love a piece, you'd like it to carry from season to season insofar as possible," she says.

Obviously, Kassabian feeds off customer satisfaction. "I want you to leave smiling," she grins.

We are. Must have been something we eight.

Uplifting salon strictly down to earth

bob + paige SALON

412 Danforth Ave.
416.850.9719
bobandpaige.com

Walking down the handful of steps that form the entranceway to Bob + Paige salon is an elevating descent into high style.

And that's just the décor. If the styling's anywhere near its equal, we're in hair-do heaven.

The magic worked by design consultant Yanna Boland and engineer Louie Katsis — with considerable input from stylist/owners Frank Calandrino and Violet Volovik — garnered Bob + Paige Salon Magazine's prestigious Salon Interior Design Award. The warmth of exposed red brick meets the coolness of steel and slate gray, offset by earthy brown tones and marble-white tiles. But the transformation Calandrino and Volovik have made to the premises pales in comparison to what they'll do with your hair — if you'll sit back and let them.

Like most inspired stylists, Calandrino and Volovik work best when given freedom to create. Accordingly, many of their customers limit their directions to "make me look beautiful".

Just because C and V are artists doesn't mean they're artistes, however. "There are no egos here," says Violet. "There's no "I" in Team," concurs Frank. "That goes for all of us. We're here to please the customer. After all, it's their hair we're styling."

Calandrino and Volovik met at Leoni Hair Design in Thornhill, where they worked together for several years. Reuniting at Bob + Paige, they selected a Danforth location for its convenience and "positive energy." The salon occupies a middle ground between the local shop that may be short on technique and the über-salon that's too big to give you one-on-one service — and often too full of itself.

C and V favour an integrated approach wherein each stylist washes, blow dries, cuts, colours, and styles you personally. The same applies to other services such as highlights or extensions: one customer, one stylist. No musical chairs, no assembly line.

"Hairstyling is very personal," says Calandrino. "Some of the big salons run you through a gauntlet, passing you from one pair of hands to another. How personal is that?" The creative process also demands a one-on-one approach, he says. "Too many cooks spoil the broth. We like to think of ourselves as artists, but the great masterpieces weren't created in factories."

Whether you're there for a regular wash, cut and trim or an it's-got-to-be-perfect wedding 'do, you'll be greeted by the same friendly smiles and a relaxed but focused approach. "We like to kibbitz, but we stay on task," says Volovik. "Casual work leads to sloppy work. Having someone trust you with their hair is a responsibility you don't take lightly." Nor will a client find it amusing if their mirror doesn't vindicate that trust.

Though the salon counts celebrities among its clients, they don't engage in name-dropping, and they treat every customer with the same reverence and respect. You'll never get bumped or lost in overbooking hell, and punctuality's a priority.

Descending a few steps has never been so uplifting.

Toronto Prep students pave own road to success

What possesses two teachers with a combined 50 years' experience to leave the security of their permanent positions and open Toronto Prep School?

250 Davisville Avenue
416.545.1020
torontoprepschool.com

TORONTO PREP SCHOOL

For Tsimikalis and wife Fouli, "doing the right thing" meant creating an academic and social environment designed to prepare students not just for admission to university, but for success — both in the post-secondary arena and in later life.

"Having your son or daughter gain admission to university may give you temporary bragging rights, but having them succeed is a source of lasting satisfaction for all concerned. We're here to mentor and to facilitate, not to enable," says Tsimikalis.

To that end, Toronto Prep is following a character-building blueprint that would make any old-school educator proud:

- A structured, nurturing environment with a maximum of 15 students per teacher;
- A focus on effort. "Gifted" is great, but the greatest gift is a strong work ethic;
- Learning means earning. No spoon-feeding, no rubber-stamping, no padding of marks;
- Positive discipline and zero tolerance of deleterious extracurricular activities and habits;
- Each student gets a MacBook Pro. That's all many teenagers would need to hear;
- A sound mind in a sound body. Each student gets a full-time membership to GoodLife Fitness (there's a club on the premises);
- Classes start at 10 am to preclude early-morning syndrome, and finish at 3:55 pm. On Friday they conclude at 2:50 pm to facilitate religious observance.

Thus armed for a full and rigorous academic curriculum, your son or daughter will also have the opportunity to participate in interscholastic athletics. And he or she will enjoy all this in a bright, modern, beautifully renovated midtown facility with abundant natural light and state-of-the-art ventilation.

Having hand-picked their teaching staff, the Tsimikalises are excited about bringing their educational vision to fruition.

"We're passionate about teaching," says Steve. "The opportunity to contribute to the development of young men and women is a mitzvah. Our only enabling mechanism is teaching them how to help themselves."

The flip side — seeing a child gravy-trained into university only to fall back due to lack of preparation — is a tragedy in the making, he says. "You're not just losing a year or two. You're setting the tone for the rest of your life. It's exponentially harder to reverse that trend than it is to do it the right way in the first place."

At the risk of sounding anachronistic, says Tsimikalis, "knowledge is earned, not won. The great Talmudic scholars had input from their mentors, but they never had a recommended mark that I know of."

Nor did they require an iPod and headphones to facilitate their studies. "It's a different world but the fundamentals haven't changed," smiles Fouli. "Cracking a book is still the best way to learn what's in it."

There's never a wrong time to do the right thing. With Toronto Prep rapidly approaching its full capacity of 150 students, however, today might be "more right" than tomorrow to contact them regarding fall enrollment.

With an environment that stimulates learning, fosters responsibility and develops leadership, Toronto Prep School offers compelling advantages for those motivated to learn by doing.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

At Avli, it's what you don't see that counts

Geographic cuisine in general — and Greek in particular — lends itself to spectacular presentation. Even a simple salad becomes a festive medley of colour.

What isn't as readily apparent is the quality of the ingredients. From the grade of olive oil used in your salad to the herbs that season your lamb, everything that goes into the food contributes not only to its taste, but also to its nutritional content — and to your well-being.

Lambrinos Vassiliou knows something about quality.

To his loyal clientele, this storied chef is a GreekTown icon. After learning his trade on the Danforth, he spent 25 years as a head chef in some of the world's finest restaurants before opening Avli in 1994 — a fortuitous homecoming for GTA lovers of Mediterranean cuisine. His innovative menu, featuring specialties from Asia Minor, represented a bold departure from mainstream Greek. He hasn't looked back since.

Avli attracts customers with a discerning palate who can taste the difference quality makes, but the identity of his customers doesn't affect Vassiliou's uncompromising approach. A first-timer who'se never tried Greek food before gets the same respect as the Greek celebrities who dine here.

"I only know one way to cook," shrugs Vassiliou, know to his customers simply as "Lambros". "The day I put less than the best on anybody's plate is the day I walk away from this business."

"Never less than his best" means always using the freshest, purest ingredients he can source and never accepting substitutes, regardless of cost. We've all been disappointed at one time or another that a favourite dish is unavailable; at Avli, it simply means the ingredients needed to prepare it weren't up to Vassiliou's freshness standards on that particular day.

Vassiliou's stubborn refusal to settle for less than perfection does not translate into higher prices, even though most would willingly pay more for such munificence. Avli's prices are typical of most GreekTown restaurants. You'll have to wait longer for your meal here — everything here is prepared fresh from scratch — but the end result is always worth the wait. From the signature entrée pies with hand-made olive oil crust to the organic chicken, every dish makes your palate sing.

With increasing concern about food origins, additives and preservatives, Avli's customers take comfort in a singular fact.

This cuisine is pristine.

Kalyvia: cooked with love tastes better

Toronto's Kalyvia is easy to find. Just head to the heart of GreekTown and look for the kind of satisfied smiles that only home cooking can produce. Then look up. You'll see a sign that says Kalyvia: A Taste Of Our Village.

It's a good thing they brought that taste here, because finding that village in Greece is a tad harder. With no fewer than 10 Kalyvias, identifying it as your home town without providing further details is like saying you live on Main Street in Canada. And claiming that your town has the best home cooking is certain to bring an argument from the nine other Kalyvias.

KALYVIA
420 DANFORTH AVE.
416 463-3333
WWW.KALYVIA.COM

One thing there's no argument about, however, is the niche this Kalyvia has carved in the Toronto culinary landscape as it enters its 20th year on the Danforth.

When founders Mike and Peter Tsafatinos passed the torch to their sons Jim and Jim, they also passed the spatula. All the Tsafatinos men can cook. In this family, knowing your way around a grill isn't just an asset; it's part of your pedigree. "Where we come from, if you can't cook, they revoke your citizenship," chuckles Jim.

There's no pecking order here, just teamwork — an entire family working as one to ensure every customer has a pleasurable dining experience.

That pleasure is enhanced the moment you enter. Of all the restaurants that line the strip, Kalyvia may well offer the best combination of authentic Greek cuisine, pleasing decor, and relaxed, family-friendly environment. Got stress? A visit to Kalyvia will alleviate it.

Even the menu is relaxed, as are the prices. All the classic Greek entrées are here, all splendidly done — the moussaka in particular — but look beyond the mainstream dishes and you'll find some real treasures. The homemade Gyros are first-rate. Once considered casual food, they have exploded in popularity and are now a go-to item on the menu. Vegetarians will enjoy four complete meal selections priced from $9.95 to $12.95.

Kalyvia's homemade goodness can be enjoyed on the premises, or in the privacy of your home or office. Large enough for substantial gatherings, but configured for intimacy, Kalyvia is ideal for birthday parties, Bar Mitzvah parties, and other special events.

Today's kitchens have evolved greatly from the wood-fired stoves of yesteryear, but the act of preparing food with love is timeless. If you grew up in a small village and you had the pleasure of watching your mother or grandmother cooking on and baking in one of those cast-iron relics — and waiting with breathless anticipation for the food to emerge — you'll understand. Cooked with love always tastes better.

At Kalyvia, close your eyes for a moment and you're once again huddled in front of that wooden stove, absorbing its warmth and waiting for the door to open. Here, you're home.

Sher-E-Punjab: new flavour frontiers

Those who enjoy the pleasures of Northern Indian cuisine know Sher-E-Punjab not only as a haven of culinary pleasure, but as a salve to the soul.

It's indisputably Toronto's pre-eminent restaurant in its class, yet it's so much more than food. You may be stressed. You may be rushed. You may have places to go and things to do. But the moment you enter this enclave of tranquility, your troubles fade away. You can literally feel the weight of the world slipping from your shoulders — and you haven't even opened the menu yet.

Earth shades of Indian slate tile — reddish brown, copper, a hint of gold — set a peaceful tone. Magnificent tapestries, hand-woven in Rajastan, adorn butternut-yellow walls. You're greeted with quiet dignity by Amar, Malkit or Jaspal Singh, or by a member of their courteous wait staff.

There's no running here. No shouting. Just Shalom.

If you enjoy bread with your meal, you'll have to resist the temptation to overorder. Sher-E's Naan is the standard by which others are measured. Hand-made on the premises, it's baked fresh on demand — every 15 minutes or so at busy times — in a huge Tandoori clay oven. The experience of seeing it emerge from the oven piping hot is surpassed only by the pleasure of eating it — doubly so now that you can enjoy garlic naan in addition to the original recipe. This, truly, is manna from heaven.

For mainstream tastes, the Tandoori chicken is first-rate, but there are many other options worth exploring. A few suggestions:

- Chicken Tikka Masala. Boneless chicken is marinated and barbequed with green peppers and onions in a delicious aromatic curry;
- Lamb Saag. A distinctively different way to enjoy lamb in GreekTown. Mild chunks of boneless lamb are gently simmered in a spinach purée;
- Shahi Kofta. Vegetable balls in a mild sauce. Sounds deceptively simple; tastes divine.

Sher-E-Punjab, in fact, has long been a preferred destination of vegetarians. Even something as simple as cauliflower and potatoes (Aloo Gobi) takes on unexpected subtlety in Sher-E-Punjab's kitchen.

Lentil soup debate?
What debate?

And, of course, there's the timeless favourite — lentil soup. If you're party to the ongoing debate as to who serves the best lentil soup in Toronto, one visit to 351 Danforth Avenue will settle it once and for all. Case closed.

After 36 years, the Sher-E-Punjab experience is as fresh and uplifting as the hand-blended spices that flavour its dishes.

Athens Pastries redefines taste buds

When you see a name like Athens Pastries, it's natural to wonder whether their product really lives up to the back-home standard or whether it's just a good facsimile trading on the reputation of the namesake city.

Ask any Torontonian who's been to Athens Pastries and they'll invariably rave about the exquisite taste, texture, and freshness. Would an Athenian do the same?

George Tsioutsioulas breaks into a wide grin. "You wouldn't believe how many people from Greece tell us that our pies and pastries are the best they've ever tasted — anywhere," he beams. So if you're planning to hop a plane to Athens for a taste test, you might want to save yourself the airfare; Athens Pastries' 30-year reputation for quality already stretches across the pond.

Simply stated, comparing Athens' spanakopita (spinach pie), cheese pie, meat pie and bougatsa to any other brands is like comparing homemade fresh-baked bread to the store-bought variety. For freshness, crispness, and flavour, no comparison is even possible.

The Athens version will permanently redefine your taste buds. Baked continuously throughout the day from the purest ingredients, with no additives or preservatives, the pastries and pies served up at this little gem of a shop have made Athens a prime destination of Danforth-goers seeking a light meal or delicious dessert.

There's table seating at both locations, and ample free parking at the Victoria Park location, but you really have to see the take-out action to understand how seriously Greeks take their pastries — and how zeroed in they are on Athens. There are more whole pies leaving here in boxes than at some pizza take-outs.

Reminiscent of the French mille feuilles, or the English custard slice, Athens' rendition of bougatsa is as close to perfection as a dessert gets: ultracrisp, delicate crust outside, light, mildly sweet vanilla custard inside. And here's the best part: even with a liberal sprinkling of icing sugar and cinnamon, at no time does it taste too sweet, and the cloying aftertaste so common with commercial desserts is noticeably absent.

This second-generation family business (owner George Tsioutsioulas, father Evangelos and their dedicated staff) has probably rolled enough pastry dough to stretch from here to Greece, so the name "Athens" is perfectly apt. The fact that it's rolled lovingly, with constant attention to quality, is confirmed by your first bite.

GreekTown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

Alexander The Great Parkette at Danforth and Logan: a popular spot to pause, relax, and reflect

More than a tourist area, GreekTown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, GreekTown puts on its Mediterranean face.

Plenty to woo your senses

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In the restaurants and cafés, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but everyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sounds of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — and the atmosphere they help create, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

Many restaurants capture, in their decor, the pleasing colours and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering the full range and flavours of Greek and other Mediterranean cuisines.

But the Danforth boasts many other fine ethnic restaurants as well. To name but a few, Japanese, Italian, and East Indian cuisine are well represented. And its cafés and dessert houses are unparalleled, both in number and quality.

GreekTown is also home to Toronto's finest natural and specialty food stores and many alternative health practitioners. And it's become a leading fashion destination, with a host of fine specialty boutiques for men, women, and children, as well as European-quality beauty salons and spas.

A solid community with solid values

There is plenty of live entertainment here. At many establishments, audience participation is the rule, though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop.

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres, but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. Majestic trees shade well-kept homes; here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders offer everyone prompt, friendly service; there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; in GreekTown, customers are family.

Also here are the institutions that belong in any healthy city neighborhood: schools, houses of worship, clubs, and community centres. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep GreekTown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants; you'll find that everyone knows everyone else. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but in GreekTown, they do so without knocking the competition. If anything, the reverse is true.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that GreekTown is closed to traffic for its duration. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience, all in support of worthy charities like the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation.

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of GreekTown. Having been there for half a century — Korry's is now celebrating its 50th anniversary — Korman knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Korman shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to GreekTown, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Sun Valley a paradise for food shoppers

If you value quality, hate spending hours schlepping through faceless supermarkets and need more than the corner store can offer, Sun Valley Fine Foods is tailor-made for you.

Larger than a neighbourhood European food store, yet small enough to navigate your way through quickly, Sun Valley is boutique food shopping at its very finest. Just about every sought-after brand name is here, from gourmet grocery items to breads, cakes and pastries. And if there's a hot new product on the market, you'll find it here first.

The produce here is simply spectacular. The fruit has fewer blemishes than the average Hollywood actress. The meat, fish and poultry are exquisite, a boon to homemakers and BBQ enthusiasts alike.

Unlike most supermarkets that include high-end brand names and quality as part of their overall mix, Sun Valley sells nothing but quality. You won't have to sift through five brands to find one good one. And the layout of the store lends itself to ease and efficiency, with the produce, bakery and grocery areas surrounding a central meat department. You'll find exactly what you need for your family and special occasion dining with friendly, knowledgeable personal service.

It's these attributes which keep customers coming back — not only the locals, but shoppers from North York, Thornhill, and even Richmond Hill, armed with the temperature-controlled bags that have become standard equipment among shoppers willing to go the extra mile for the very best.

People come from outside GreekTown to shop Sun Valley "for the same reasons they patronize the restaurants," says Spiro Aravantinos: "quality, freshness, flavour, and value."

Ah yes, value. What Aravantinos doesn't mention — but what's common knowledge among Sun Valley shoppers — is that they've resisted "snob appeal". In true GreekTown spirit, they've kept their prices affordable even as their reputation has continued to grow.

The bottom line is that under this one roof you'll find exactly what you want in less time — yet at a more leisurely pace — than in the "big box" supermarkets. And, if you're a husband who'se been "commissioned" to bring home the groceries, your chances of getting a glowing report card on arrival are better here than just about anywhere else.

The reason is simple. Sun Valley just doesn't sell anything that won't get the spousal seal of approval — no matter how hard that may be to come by in your household.

New twist has Akropolis pies on upward spiral

Having your life spiral out of control isn't always a bad thing. Just ask Peter and Bill Gekas of Akropolis Pastries.

Involved since childhood in their parents' business (Akropolis Pastries at 708 Danforth Avenue), both boys took an adult hiatus to pursue other careers — Peter in teaching, Bill in operations management. During this period, while continuing to help out their parents, they watched the demand for Akropolis' handmade products grow to exceed supply and the ability to replenish it by traditional methods. Says Peter, "It occurred to us that if we could produce our pies on a larger scale without compromising quality, it might enable us to meet demand and create new markets for our products."

Extensive testing and tweaking led to a recipe that would allow them to produce their Spanakopita (Spinach/Feta), Tyropita (Feta/Ricotta), Kreatopita (Beef), and Bougatsa (Custard) pies in larger quantities with the same old-world quality and flaky pastry as the hand-made variety. They then had a brainstorm: Why not change the shape of things to come? Thus was born North America's first and only "twister": a signature swirl of proprietarily-prepared pastry that, much like a twister bagel, offers endless undulations to enjoy.

That's when things began to spiral out of control.

It didn't take long for the Gekas twister to whip up a tornado of wholesale activity. Pusateri's and Highland Farms quickly bought in, and other fine stores, including Whole Foods in the U.S., soon followed. Today, dozens of better food stores and restaurants proudly sell Akropolis' pies — in twister, mini rolls, and other formulations.

Further enhancing the line's appeal is the fact that all the pies are egg-free and trans-fat free, made with non-hydrogenated vegetable oil and unbleached flour. The combination of great taste, healthy ingredients and reasonable prices has proven irresistible to vendors and consumers alike.

The increased popularity of Akropolis' products has made staying ahead of the production curve a full-time job. Through constant machinery and equipment upgrades, the Gekas brothers have spared no expense to ensure a steady flow of supply to their eager clientele.

Akropolis' state-of-the-art factory in Scarborough is open to the public for large catering and party orders. The hubbub of production, however, is nowhere in evidence at the original Akropolis Pastries on the Danforth. At the little shop that Thomas and Aliki Gekas opened in 1979, nine years after immigrating from Thessaloniki, serenity is the rule. "Our parents are old-school," says Peter. "They sell our products but they still make all the sweet pastries by hand — the baklava, the galaktoboureko, the loukoumades, the katafi."

At the pleasant, licensed Akropolis bakery restaurant, in addition to the pies, pastries and a variety of coffees, you can also enjoy a combination platter consisting of your choice of spinach, meat or cheese pie with a Greek salad and tzatziki for a mere $6. "We may be innovative, but our prices are retro," says Peter.

So the next time your hectic lifestyle has you spiralling out of control, head down to the Danforth or to your nearest fine food store for the antidote: another type of spiral that goes down smoother than a Scarlett O'Hara staircase.

Danforth Jewish Circle: building community values

Some ten years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996 and then chaired by Marlee Wyman.

Giving children a sense of community

At the time, Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she recently said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

At that time, the local Hebrew heritage program, a school board program that had been operating in the neighbourhood for some 15 years, could only offer a basic introduction to Jewish studies, she said.

"The program was instrumental in creating a sense of Jewish identity and a sense of community," she said. "But [it] had trouble developing as a curriculum because it had to cater to a wide age group. What was happening was that our families had no choice but to look outside the community to further their child's Jewish education."

The group of parents met many times in the course of the year to establish a community-based supplementary school. They had to develop a curriculum, hire teachers and publicize the program to attract students, find funding and find a space to hold classes, Plested said.

Now in its 12th year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for elementary school students out of a local school. Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

While the exploration of Jewish identity is a key component of the curriculum, Plested said that given the high proportion of interfaith families, there is also an emphasis on "respect for the broad spectrum of multiculturalism which exists within Judaism and in the neighbourhood."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their Bat or Bar Mitzvah...If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor."

416-825-7431
www.djctoronto.com

B'Nai Mitzvah program: building and bonding

In addition to the school, the DJC offers a B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents and not funded by any group. "This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program. "It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism: action is taken because we want to see results."

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Greeks with a Taste for building something bigger than themselves

Circa 447–432 B.C., the Greeks built the Parthenon. Today, the same tradition of architectural excellence is alive and well in GreekTown, under the watchful eyes of Takis Liris, Adonis Artemakis, and their dedicated crew. The showcase of their efforts is a small, nondescript storefront at 921 Danforth Avenue.

No towering columns? No sculpted statues?

A different kind of architectural renaissance

If the venue seems odd, it's because this team of "architects" specializes in historical reconstruction — not of buildings, but of people. Under their direction, a team of volunteers helps those laid low by alcohol and drug addiction to rebuild their lives and self-esteem and become functioning members of society.

With financial assistance from Employment Ontario and the City of Toronto — as well as funds generated from the sale of clothing donations to the Oasis green bins throughout the GTA — the Oasis Movement acts as an umbrella organization for a myriad of programs designed to assist addicts every step of the way through the recovery process. There's an Employment Preparation Program, a Pre-Employment Personal Life Management Program, a Volunteer Program including participants from Toronto Social Services and the general public, a Job Development and Employment Placement Services Program, Casual Labour Placements, and the Oasis Employment Resource Centre.

Building is nothing new to Artemakis. A fireplug of a man, he has been instrumental in many important initiatives both inside and outside the Greek community. In 1993 he was involved in changing the name of the then Danforth Village to the current GreekTown On The Danforth. The following year, Artemakis and several other key players — including Stephane Abbat, Dr. Andy Syriopoulos, Sue Graham-Nuttier, and Saul Korman — spearheaded the creation of the Taste of the Danforth. With the financial support of Alex Alexakis of Krinos Foods and the ongoing contributions of many others, the Taste has grown from a small festival with a first-year attendance of some 6,000 to what today is North America's largest street festival with an annual attendance in excess of one million.

Despite his key role in heightening the profile of Toronto's Greek community and its important contributions to the GTA's culture and economy, Artemakis sees the Danforth as "a multicultural community with a Greek character. The beauty of a cultural mosaic is that each culture or "tile" enhances the others," he says. "We have here a dynamic of mutual enrichment that all communities should be proud to be part of."

If the growth of the Taste makes him smile, the work he and Takis Liris are involved in at Oasis makes him positively light up. Says Liris, who founded the Oasis Movement in 1992, "To assist someone who is already on an upcurve is nice. But to help someone who's down pick himself up — now there's an accomplishment. We may think we know what it's like to hit rock bottom, but unless we've experienced it ourselves or seen it first-hand, we really don't know what it's like. When we can reach out to someone in that position and help him or her regain the ability to function, be gainfully employed, mend broken relationships, restore their faith — that's a success story for everybody."

The birth of an area, the Taste, a movement

Continues Artemakis, who's been involved with Oasis since 1992 in a supportive and Advisory capacity, "There's no stage here, no award presentations, no trophies. Everyone who is here is part of something bigger than themselves. People talk of "relationship building". Here, we are helping people rebuild their relationship with themself. No office tower, theatre or concert hall is a greater monument to a person's accomplishment than helping another human being get back on his feet again."

"While you're getting the baklava, would you mind picking me up a Mazda?"

Talk about a convenient location. We're so close to GreekTown, you can almost read the menus from our showroom.

As Toronto's oldest Mazda dealer (35 years in business), we know a thing or two about prompt, friendly service — the same kind of service you expect on the Danforth.

Just like your favourite GreekTown restaurants, we're family owned and operated and are now serving our second generation of customers, with the third generation on its way.

Without you, our customers, we would not be in business today. Customers are never an interruption in our day; they are the only reason for it!

We always keep this front of mind, and never stop striving to earn your confidence and trust.

We welcome the opportunity to serve you, and look forward to your visit. We have everything you need for a pleasant driving experience.

And the proximity for a pleasant dining experience.

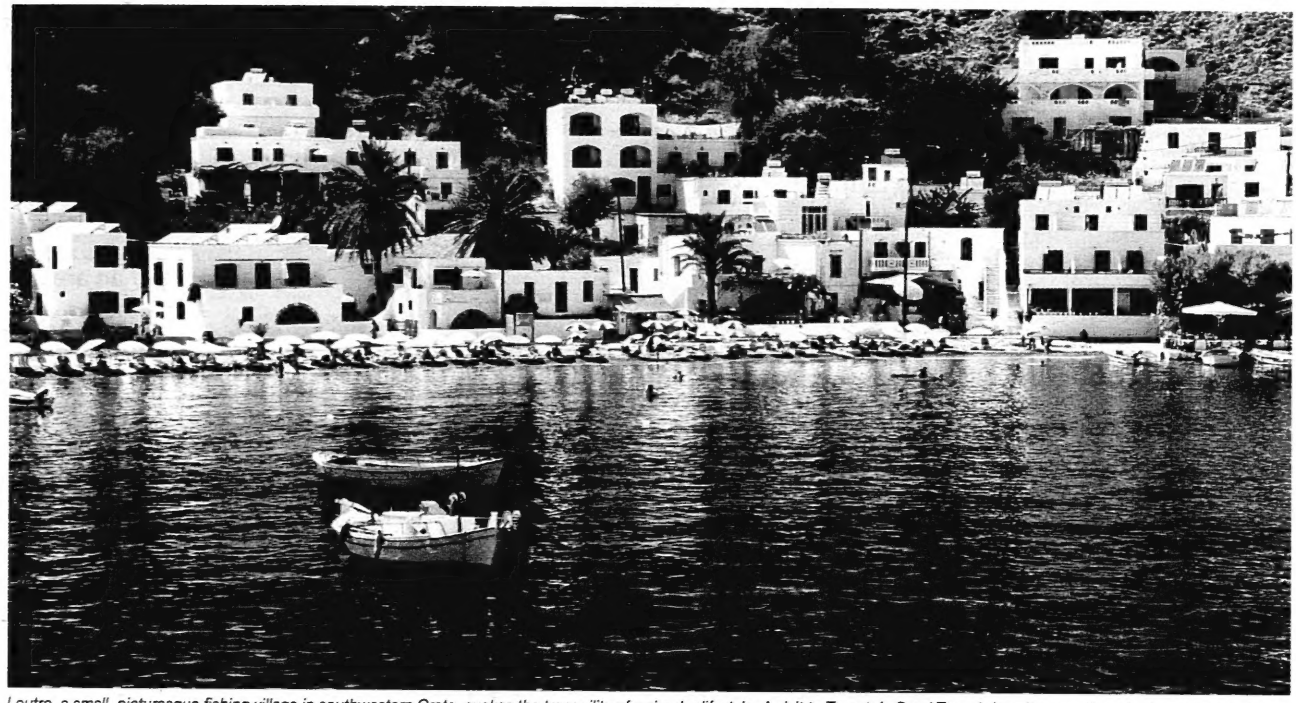
GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH



Loutro, a small, picturesque fishing village in southwestern Crete, evokes the tranquility of a simpler lifestyle. A visit to Toronto's GreekTown brings its warmth and values closer to home.

All fish and chips not created equal

Fish and chips is fish and chips, right? Wrong, say those for whom this dish is sacrosanct. As it happens, most of them are customers of Captain John, whose reputation for fish and chips is city-wide.

Generally believed to have originated in the United Kingdom, fish and chips is considered casual food by many. Not this crowd: they take their fish and chips seriously. They'll not only tell you that all fish and chips are not created equal, they'll prove it — with a dissertation so eloquent it resembles a doctoral thesis. Here are the broad strokes:

800 Danforth Ave.
416-463-8666

373 Donlands Ave.
416-422-3474

Crispness. The quality prized above all by fish and chip lovers. A feather-light batter and impeccable timing are essential to ensure your fish is always crisp — never oily or greasy. There's a fine line between just right and soggy, and that line that takes only a few nanoseconds for the inexperienced fish fryer to cross. Captain John knows that line and avoids the soggy side like the Bermuda Triangle. There are no electronic timers here — just old pros with an innate sense of timing for maximum crispness. Any fisherman who's ever tugged on his line at precisely the right moment would appreciate the sudden swiftness with which Captain John scoops its catch from the fryer.

The same principle applies to the chips, with a bit more room for error. We're talking seconds here as opposed to nanoseconds.

Freshness. No amount of crispness will compensate for lack of freshness, which affects taste, texture and aroma. Captain John buys the freshest halibut, haddock and cod and the highest quality cooking oil, which is changed with great regularity.

It's not unusual to find a "chippy" — as the British call it — in an area with many Greek restaurants. What is unusual is to find one as expansive and festive as the Danforth location. Big, bright and attractively tiled, it's a fish and chips "destination store" as opposed to a small neighbourhood shop, which their Donlands location more closely resembles. Both are immaculate, with identical menus, and fully licensed. There are a variety of other items on the menu to accommodate those who aren't yet on the fish and chip bandwagon — errr, boat.

There really is a man named John behind the Captain John persona, but he's not not big on last names. "I want to be known for my fish and chips, not my name," he smiles. Truth be told, he's very well known to fish and chip lovers who have enjoyed his culinary expertise in other GTA establishments for close to four decades. No relation to or affiliation with Captain John harbour boat restaurant, he came by his fish pedigree honestly, having grown up in a small fishing village in Greece. "If you didn't catch anything, you didn't eat," he grins.

An apt metaphor for all parnossah.

So the next time you want to enjoy fresh fish and chips with a high crispness quotient and a taste as big as the ocean, set sail for Captain John. And say hi to the man at the rudder. He's got a big smile for friends and customers, both old and new.

And a great sense of timing.

In this thouliamou, they don't count the hours

Thouliamou. Parnossah. Livelihood. It's what most of us are lucky to have. And what most of us still complain about in our weaker moments.

The most common complaint is long hours. For many of us, 12- or 15-hour days mean overtime. For the average GreekTown restauranteur, they're standard time.

For most of us, one a.m. and unable to sleep means it's time to take a sedative. For the GreekTown restauranteur, it means it's time to serve another customer.

Long hours? Long days? These people eat long days for breakfast.

In fact, some of their days are so long, they finish up just in time to see their children eat breakfast.

Passing the torch is a metaphor frequently used in GreekTown. Mom and Dad or Dad and Uncle start a business, build it up, and pass the torch to their children. Here, the metaphor's doubly apt because with the hours some restauranteurs keep, that torch could well be a flashlight.

Time was, it was almost automatic for children to take up that torch. Today, less so. Times have changed. Children can now count their options because Mom and Dad didn't count their hours.

Good thing they didn't. How could they? In this business, serving food is just the tip of the iceberg. In order to be able to serve it, you have to first take inventory, buy supplies, bring them to the restaurant, and prepare them. As well as do a few other things like cleaning, washing, maintenance, linens, laundry, cuttlery, payroll, hiring, paying bill after bill after bill — a triplication of your bills at home — the list goes on.

Unless you're so successful you can afford hired help for everything, you won't get it all done in eight hours. You might not get it done in ten hours. But in 12 or 15 hours, slowly slowly, you get it all done. Or enough of it to enjoy the few hours of sleep that remain — far more than the eight hours you wouldn't enjoy if you left all those loose ends hanging.

Times change, but values don't. Of the restaurants featured in this section, the vast majority are family businesses. Some have been passed on from parents to children, but in many of them, the parents are still active.

The inability to count can be habit-forming; many of these people don't count the years, let alone hours. Why should they? Why pass the torch when you're having so much fun carrying it yourself?

The children who do take up that torch — because the restaurant business is locked into their DNA — inherit not only a lifestyle but a lesson.

They learn that in this thouliamou, time is a relative concept. It's easier to work the hours than to count them. And it's relatively easier to work them with a relative or two working alongside you.

They learn that the 12- or 15-hour days that Mom and Dad worked — those long hours that might have deprived them of their favourite audience for a hockey game or soccer game or dance class — weren't really too many hours all. Turns out they were just the right number of hours needed to put bread on the table.

They learn that even though it's impossible not to feel enslaved by the business occasionally, it's more often liberating to discover just how much you can accomplish when you push your limits. And how much more time you had than you thought you had when less time is spent sleeping.

Most importantly, they learn that — in this thouliamou at least — long hours aren't the problem.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Really? A private party in a beautifully reconstructed theatre? With amazing food and a vibrant ambience? Is that true or is it an urban myth

Reality dictates that you can't have your cake and eat it too? We're sorry reality isn't able to accommodate you, but at Myth, we can.

We have everything you could possibly want in a party venue, and we're committed to making your event "Special". That's why you call it a "Party."

AMBIENCE. As a restored theatre with palatially-high ceilings and a loft-style mezzanine, we offer a spectacular setting with a variety of seating arrangements ideal for both casual and formal events. When we invite you to "stage" your event at Myth, we mean it literally.

SIZE. We're large enough to host major functions like wedding receptions, Bar / Bat Mitzvahs, and corporate events, yet small enough to ensure intimacy for family milestones.

CUISINE. Our extensive Mediterranean menu is only a hint of the dining opportunities that await you. Our culinary team will be pleased to create complete custom menus to suit your taste and budget.

SERVICE. Happening parties don't just "happen"... they are the result of meticulous planning by both the event planner and the staff of the venue they choose. We're proud to be one of Toronto's leading venues for private parties and special events. Whether your party is large or small, you can count on us for the attentive personal service you need. You want to be free to mingle with your guests and enjoy their company, not have to deal with details every five minutes. We will spare no pains to ensure that you have that freedom.

Having our professionals at Myth host your event is the easiest way we know to transform question marks into an exclamation mark...as in "Opa!"
